Director's Column, December 2018
Martin Meeker sits down to reflect on the past year at the OHC, and looks to the year ahead.

OHC Commences Project to Commemorate 50th Anniversary of Chicana/o Studies

Today, courses on the Mexican American experience can be found at nearly every college campus across the nation. In an academic environment long entrenched within the mold of Western Europe, such curriculum is nothing short of a miraculous testament to the diversification of American education. Yet fifty years ago, the discipline of Chicana/o Studies was just taking shape and, above all, struggling for legitimacy.

To commemorate the 50th anniversary of the discipline, the OHC initiated the Chicana/o Studies Oral History Project. Led by Todd Holmes, the project documents the historical development of the field through in-depth interviews with the first generation of scholars who shaped it. The interviews will offer an important look at the formation of Chicana/o Studies, as well as the experiences of those who built it.

All interviews are slated to be completed by the summer of 2019. When done, they will be featured in a documentary film, tentatively titled, Chicana/o Studies: The Legacy of A Movement and the Forging of A Discipline. Read more about the project on our blog and watch the trailer here!
Introductory Workshop and Advanced Oral History Summer Institute!

Looking for a primer on oral history? Apply now for our Introductory Workshop, which will be held on Saturday, March 2, 2019.

Want to dig deeper into the method and practice of oral history? Apply for our Advanced Oral History Summer Institute, which will be held from August 5-9, 2019.

Advanced Oral History Summer Institute Alumni Spotlight: Alec O'Halloran

We recently caught up with Alec O'Halloran, who joined us in 2010 all the way from Australia. O'Halloran just released a new book, The Master from Marnpi, about Aboriginal artist Mick Namarari Tjapaltjarri. We caught up with him about his new project, his time at the Summer Institute, and what inspires him.

"Women in Politics" Panel Discussion with Jane Kim & Mary Hughes Recap

In last month’s midterms elections, a wave of diverse women swept into political office across America. From local school boards to Congressional and gubernatorial races, women showed up this November. While many may point to this result as the culmination of women’s dedicated activism since 2016, in places like the Bay Area, well-established political organizations helped pull women candidates over the finish line.

On Tuesday, November 13th, one week after the polls closed, OHC staff and local political buffs met at The Ruby to discuss the historical and contemporary role of political women in the Bay Area and to help kick off the Women in Bay Area Politics Oral History Project. The event featured a panel discussion with political consultant and Close the Gap California founder Mary Hughes and San Francisco Supervisor Jane Kim, moderated by OHC interviewer Amanda Tewes. Read more about the insight they shared from their combined years of experience on our blog.

The Oral History Center Year in Review: Our Favorite Interview Moments

Martin Meeker: Of the dozens of revelatory, challenging, or even hilarious moments in my interviews this year, I find it difficult to highlight just one. But I keep coming back to this moment in my interview with famed ACLU attorney Marshall Krause. Krause defended a number of individuals charged with obscenity in San Francisco in the 1960s, including Vorpal Gallery owner Muldoon Elder for putting Ron Boise’s erotic Kama Sutra sculptures on display. While recounting the story, Krause mentioned that he had one of the artworks in question, so I asked him to bring it out to show on camera. I then asked him to provide the kind of defense he did in the courtroom in 1964. Krause’s sensitive, insightful, convincing words made it obvious why the jury acquitted Elder of the charges, thus giving Krause and the cause of the freedom of expression a victory.

Amanda Tewes: My favorite interview moment of 2018 occurred when I interviewed Bay Area herbalist and aromatherapist Jeanne Rose. In the 1960s, Rose was the couturier for bands like Jefferson Airplane and was very plugged into the local rock and roll scene. During one of our sessions together, Rose recounted her experience at the Altamont Speedway Free Festival on December 6, 1969, when an agitated audience of about 300,000 erupted into violence. Rose watched the chaos from above the crowd, but still recalls the strong emotions from that day. Hearing about the event firsthand reinforced how scary and chaotic the events must have been for concert goers. Interestingly, Rose marked this concert as “the end” of rock and roll.

Paul Burnett: This is an excerpt from an unpublished interview with UC Berkeley Engineering Scientist Emeritus George Leitmann on his service in the US Counterintelligence Corps during and after World War II. Prior to this assignment, he worked in reconnaissance as a US combat engineer attached to the French Army, behind enemy lines. It is worth noting that a significant portion of Dr. Leitmann’s career has been devoted to accounting for extremely improbable and potentially catastrophic events when designing models and systems:

"Right at the end of the war, there was a suspicion that the Nazis had started an underground called the Werewolves. We spent quite a bit of time on that for the first few months. I don’t think we ever found any. We once raided an outfit that were presumably Werewolves. I don’t remember what happened to them, except that we sort of used movie techniques to make the raid, coming through the skylights.”

Todd Holmes: My favorite moment this year was interviewing Professor James C. Scott at his farm in Durham, Connecticut. The Sterling Professor of Political Science and Anthropology at Yale University, Scott is widely regarded as one of the most influential thinkers of our time, producing an unparalleled corpus of books over the last 50 years on peasant politics, resistance, and state governance, which today are standard reading across a host of disciplines worldwide. Yet in the interviews, we get a glimpse of the unassuming human being behind the books as Scott discusses the two principles that have always underpinned his approach to academic work - principles he stresses. The first: "Don’t ever be afraid to be an army of one in a crowd of a hundred," a philosophy of independence he came to embrace during his Quaker education as a young man. The second: "If you’re not having fun, what the hell are you doing?" For those who know Jim Scott, the latter is certainly an oft-quoted remark he has extolled to colleagues and graduate students for decades. Spending the weekend at his farm, I quickly realized that those principles were not just lofty ideals, but words he lived by, and I would be wise to do the same.

Shanna Farrell: My favorite moment this year was during an interview with WWII Veteran Lawson Sakai, who is in his nineties, for the East Bay Regional Park Parkland Oral History Project. Sakai’s parent immigrated from Japan, making him Nisei, or second generation. He spoke about needing to flee California to avoid internment, and the role that farming in the Central Valley played to rebuild the Japanese community in the aftermath. Driscoll Farms was just getting started and needed help growing strawberries. They recruited Japanese farmers, asked them to farm the land, and split profits with them 50/50. After hearing how Driscoll helped many people get back on their feet after losing everything in the wake of Executive Order 9066, I scoured my food history books and didn’t find any information about this. I felt like I had stumbled upon a hidden historical gem.

Roger Eardley-Pryor: Interviewing Aaron Mair—the 57th president of the Sierra Club and the Club’s first African-American president—provided my favorite interview moments this year. We conducted Aaron’s initial interview session at the Hagood Mill Historic Site in the upcountry of South Carolina. As his family’s genealogist, Aaron has the 1865 records of his enslaved great, great grandfather Zion McKenzie’s emancipation from the Hagood family. Before interviewing at the Hagood Mill site, Aaron and I visited the humble, un-fenced cemetery of his enslaved ancestors, whose rough, uncut gravestones lay just outside the Hagood family’s iron-fenced grave site with grandiose tombs and Confederate soldier crosses. Later,
During his interview, Aaron recounted his ancestors' remarkable stories from slavery to freedom and their purchase of farm land that remains in Aaron's family today. His family's narrative, from human dominion to sustainable stewardship of land, informs Aaron's ideas on environmental responsibility. And it helped inspire Aaron's initiatives as Sierra Club president to unify activism for environmental rights with civil rights and labor rights. Aaron takes seriously Sierra Club founder John Muir's admonition that "When we try to pick out anything by itself, we find it hitched to everything else in the Universe."

Mair and Eardley-Pryor

New Oral History Releases!
Check out the interviews that have been recently added to our collection:
  - Howard Friesen: UC Berkeley alum (1950), engineer, entrepreneur, and philanthropist (read the blog post by interviewer Roger Eardley-Pryor)

In Memory of Professor Susan Ervin-Tripp

We are saddened to learn of the passing of Susan Ervin-Tripp, former UC Berkeley professor. Shanna Farrell interviewed Ervin-Tripp in 2016, in which they discussed her life, career, and many contributions to the field of Psycholinguistics and equity for women at the UC Berkeley campus. She was truly inspiring, and will live on in our hearts, research, and archives.
WHAT WE'RE READING

There There by Tommy Orange
Barracoon by Zora Neale Hurston
World War Z: An Oral History of the Zombie War by Max Brooks

Want More?

Like what we're doing?
Stay connected with us on social media, listen to our podcast (and don't forget to rate us on iTunes!), or consider a donation to support our work.
See you next month!

Donate Now
Social Media
Like us on iTunes

The Oral History Center
http://www.lib.berkeley.edu/libraries/bancroft-library/oral-history-center

Connect with us

Connect with us

Connect with us

Connect with us

Connect with us

Connect with us

Connect with us

Connect with us

Connect with us