In carrying out any observations you look deliberately for each characteristic you know may be there, for any unusual feature, and especially for any suggestive associations or relationships among the things you see, or between them and what you know.... It is well to forget statistics when doing this and consider the possibility of some significance behind slender associations in the observed data, even though they would be dismissed at a glance if regarded on a mathematical basis. More discoveries have arisen from intense observation of very limited material than from statistics applied to large groups. The value of the latter lies mainly in testing hypotheses arising from the former.
