

37. SUMMARY OF ARCHAEOLOGICAL SURVEY AND EXCAVATION IN CALIFORNIA

M. A. Baumhoff and A. B. Elsasser

When the extensive bibliography of California archaeology is reviewed, it becomes apparent that there is a nucleus of research papers in the form of field reports, all of which seem to aim toward solutions of common archaeological problems. These problems are largely concerned with internal relationships, between local cultural sequences, for example, and are considered against the backdrop of California as a separate, or even detached area. On the other hand wider relationships, though not extending beyond the Northwest Coast, the Southwest, or the Great Basin, are sometimes introduced as specific problems.

The present paper, with the accompanying map, is an attempt graphically to summarize all field research, published or in available manuscript form, which might be expected ultimately to contribute to a general treatise on California archaeology, including extra-areal relationships wherever indicated.

Evidently a valuable aid to the achievement of this goal may be offered by the collection of all pertinent research papers in some such manner as the present study. Summaries of this nature necessarily of course have to be selective--for example distributional studies such as Steward's paper on petroglyphs cannot be properly included, for the present, at least. Petroglyphs are not easily amenable to association with other specific cultural elements and therefore cannot be effectively fitted into any temporal sequences.

The summary is divided into four parts: (1) the map, (2) site references, represented by dots on the map and arranged in a list alphabetically by county, and in numerical order, the numbers referring to University of California Archaeological Survey site numbers, (3) area references, listed in numerical order and indicated on the map with arbitrary numbers running roughly in order from north to south, and (4) a bibliography. The site and area references are partly annotated, for clarification. The bibliography contains published works, and in the case of unpublished manuscripts, the location of the file, here mostly the Department of Anthropology, University of California, Berkeley, and the catalogue number of the manuscript.

In all references, primary data only are considered for citation. For example, referring to Meighan's report, titled Archaeology of the North Coast Ranges it will be seen that the region has not been indicated on the map as a large outlined area, because several of the cultures are synthesized from other reports and descriptions. That part of the report dealing with the archaeology of site Men-500, primary data, on the other hand, is indicated by the symbol for sites excavated.
