Thanks!

I just picked up a copy of July's CU! at the Women's Building and wanted to personally thank you for publishing the July 29 concert of Chinese music by the Flowing Stream Ensemble. I also noticed the article on the Third World/People of Color Lesbian/Gay Conference, and I want to encourage and congratulate CU! for helping to develop a Third World presence in the lesbian/gay community. Again, many thanks for your support.

BWMT Responds to Coors

An Open letter to the Tavern Guild:
It was with extreme consternation that we of BWMT-SF received word that the Adolph Coors Co. of Golden, Colorado has "upped the ante" in its attempt to overcome the effects of the community-wide boycott of its products. As if their initial bribe of $10,000 were not enough, now they come on bented knees offering to underwrite the administrative costs of a health plan for owners and employees of Gay bars.

Let's make no mistake here. The Coors brothers have not had a change of heart. They have not been born-again into Gay Liberation. What they have been hurt by the denial of the Gay buck; that's all. Will they cease contributing their profits to the Bryants, Briggs and Falwells of the world, whose chosen mission is the eradication of faggots and dykes? We think not. As the Mormon Marriotts promote their "Gay Night" at Great America, so will the Coors brothers take Gay dollars until such time as they see fit to lock us up or worse.

With the issuance of BWMT's report on discriminatory employment practices in San Francisco's Gay bars, and confirmed by the report of San Francisco's Human Rights Commission, the Tavern Guild can ill afford to crawl into bed with the Coors brothers, who have testified by word and deed to their racism and homophobia.

Among San Francisco's institutions are racism and BWMT. The city isn't large enough for both, and we are determined to stay. We want the Tavern Guild to join with us to voluntarily eliminate prejudice and discrimination in our own community. To join hands with Coors is worse than counter-productive; it smells of collaboration with the enemy. All the health plans in the world are not worth the dehumanization and degradation that the racism and homophobia practiced by Coors have brought upon Black, White, Brown, Yellow, Red, Lesbian and Gay people.

Respectfully,

Oseto Still Treading Water

To the women of the Bay Area, SF in particular:
Oseto hot tub for women, the only public women-only space in the Bay Area is still having too many slow days to survive. The article in May Coming Up! which let people know we were in trouble, and also that you can't get AIDS or herpes from our hot tub, was very helpful. Business was better in June, but now things are slacking off again.

If you haven't been to Oseto, please check it out; it's a lovely place to relax, have a hot tub and maybe a massage. If you have been to Oseto, I have a suggestion, especially for those women who like it when it's not crowded: come a little more often. That way you'll find it busy sometimes, but you'll still find it quiet at other times. AND IT WILL BE THERE FOR YOU WHEN YOU NEED IT! We need your continual support to make a go of it. Make Oseto a habit. It's a good one.

Thanks to all our customers and friends
Julie Dobkin, Oseto manager

Sexism & the Cops

It seems the S.F. cops consider vile and violent sexism to be harmless fun.

They hoot, holler and hold up numbered cards to "rate" female Democratic Party Convention delegates, while Mayor Feinstein says, "They were just bored." And in their unprovoked, bloodthirsty attacks on anti-right wing demonstrators, the cops particularly relished beating women protestors, choking one, unconscious.

The cops pretend to be neutral protectors of the city and of free speech. But they use the media to divide "respectable" pro-Democratic Party demonstrations from "unrespectable" demonstrations against the Moral Majority, the KKK and the huge corporations—a first step toward suppressing all demonstrations. They enforce their view with clubs.

These are Democratic Mayor Feinstein's cops. Their bigoted, repressive behavior proves that the Democratic Party cares no more about human rights than the Republicans.

It's time for a change, time to build an independent political party that will represent all those victims of the two major parties owned by the wealthy, including women, Blacks, Asians, Latinos, American Indians, gays, labor, the elderly and the disabled. If the disenfranchised majority gets together, we can build a spectacular, truly democratic and representative alternative to the Democratic and Republican charade.

Constance Scott, Radical Women

Not a Women's Street Fair

We are writing this letter out of concern that the Women's Street Fair (held Labor Day weekend on Valencia Street) has been and will continue to be misrepresented to our Community. As crafts-women, we feel that any event which solicits crafts booths and calls itself a "women's" fair should minimally require that the crafts be woman-made. Women who attend events such as this expect the money they spend is going to support women.

After a discussion with Ellen Andrews, the promoter of the fair (whose office is the same as that of the Castro Street Fair), as well as with Valencia Street businesses and others who attended last year's fair, the following points are clear:

1) Items for sale at the Women's Street Fair are not necessarily crafted by women nor do they have woman-related content.

2) The fair is neither sponsored by nor connected with any organization within the Women's Community.

3) The fair does not raise money for the Women's Community. All profits, if any, go to the promoter.

We do not feel that Andrews is acting in bad faith by organizing this fair, but we acknowledge that her ideas about what constitutes a women's event are very different from ours. Criticism of last year's Women's Street Fair by Valencia Street merchants, women's organizations, and people who attended indicates that the fair needs to have a different focus, a different spirit of intent. Otherwise, it is basically indistinguishable from other San Francisco street fairs and should be called the Valencia Street Fair. It is important that information about this event be published so that women can choose whether to participate.

NAMBLA in Parade

A letter to Parade Committee:
We the undersigned members of the Bay Area Lesbian/Gay community wish to voice our strong objection to the participation of the North American Man/Boy Love Association in the Lesbian/Gay Freedom Day Parade and Celebration.

The idea that NAMBLA is an oppressed sexual group with whom the Lesbian/Gay community should be sympathetic and supportive is ludicrous and harmful. This organization supports the concept that any adult, male or female, homosexual or heterosexual, who so wishes should have the freedom to engage in sexual activity (i.e., anal or vaginal penetration, oral copulation, etc.) with a four year old child if the child agrees to the act. (The age of the child is actually irrelevant to NAMBLA. A four year old child is only used as an example. In fact one of their recommended readings spoke approvingly of those who are sexually attracted to infants.) Their argument that a child can make a responsible decision in this regard insults the intelligence of any reasonably sane adult. Children are known to be easily manipulated and exploited, sometimes with most tragic consequences.

In addition, we feel that many Lesbians and Gays spend most of their lives trying to combat the damaging myths and stereotypes about our lifestyle held by the heterosexual public, a primary myth being that we are pedophiles and anti-family. The presence of NAMBLA at Lesbian/Gay events only serves to cripple our attempts to educate heterosexuals by reinforcing their homophobia, and ultimately undermines legislative efforts which could insure our civil rights.

Most importantly, we love children, and those of us who are in particular parents and co-parents live in fear for our children's safety and welfare, never knowing if the next child who is raped, molested, kidnapped or murdered will be ours. Some of us are survivors of childhood sexual assault and abuse, learning to overcome the nightmare of our early experiences. All of us are disappointed, offended, and angered by the insensitivity and poor judgement reflected in your decision to include this group of self-avowed child molesters in our celebration.

We believe an apology to us is in order, and we also want to be assured that in the future the North American Man/Boy Love Association will not be included in our Lesbian/Gay Freedom Day festivities. A timely response to this letter will be appreciated.

Yours truly,

Signed by 40 lesbians and gay men

Community Response To Sex & the Baths

Thanks from AIDS Foundation

I would like to take this opportunity to commend you as publisher/producer for encouraging Michael Helquist and Rick Osman to write their article "Sex and the Baths: A Not-So-Secret Report" which you published in the June issue of Coming Up!

I found Michael and Rick's presentation of the "current-state-of-affairs" in the San Francisco bathhouse arena insightful as well as responsible journalistic reporting. It is imperative that our community continue to focus on an important issue as it relates to the AIDS epidemic. The trouble is not where one engages in sexual activity, the point is that we must all consciously engage in safer sexual activity and take mutual responsibility for all members of our community.

I realize that there was a certain degree of risk involved in publishing an article such as this which was not your "typical" journalistic effort. I would like to say that on behalf of myself and the San Francisco AIDS Foundation, I found that risk a very important and positive step forward in the AIDS struggle and education process. Not only did the article provide important facts and a current AIDS update, it also provided an important narrative section where readers could personally relate to situations and peer pressure which promotes positive change.

I applaud your editorial prerogative to print this article. I hope to see more journalistic endeavors of this kind in the future.

James M. Ferels
Executive Director, SF AIDS Foundation
San Francisco

A Clean, Safe Environment

I found your articles on bathhouse sex to be informative, fair, and in some instances I even got a chuckle out of them. While I cannot agree in particular with all the safe sex guidelines on a very personal level, I do have posted in my own club, The Body Works, in Indianapolis, Safe Sex posters, and have at least 5 different kinds of free literature available in open areas for patrons to take home with them or read while they're here. The Body Works for the last 7 years has also sponsored a free VD Clinic at our club. We also distribute free literature on other STD's and Hepatitis. We have worked with our County Health Department since the first day we have opened. Many other clubs in the IGHC have done these same things for many years before the topic of AIDS ever arose.

Gay men will not, I firmly believe, give up sex or their sexuality for an indefinite period of time. Indiscriminate, even casual, sex has been part of our life since time immemorial. If gay men, or anyone for that matter, are going to engage in indiscriminate sexual practices, then I, for one, would rather they did it in a safe, clean environment (e.g. a bathhouse) rather than in the woods, tea rooms, back room bars. At least in the confines of a bathhouse gay men have the opportunity to clean up and out, before and after sex. The only other place gay men can do this is in the confines of their own home. The bathhouse also gives us the opportunity to educate these men through providing them with the latest information available about AIDS and "safe sex."

As a final note, it is ironic to note that many of the very people who are calling for bathhouse closures do themselves promote indiscriminate sex. As one small example of this, do not those publications who are advocating the closure of bathhouses all run rather large personal columns which are usually filled with both men and women who are looking for sex partners? Precisely what is wrong with looking for people with whom one is compatible for the purpose of having sex with them?

Sincerely,
Stanley E. Berg
Managing Director, The Body Works
Indianapolis, IN

Safe and Sexy

Congratulations to Michael Helquist and Rick Osman on your article, "Sex and the Baths." By sharing your own personal experiences, you have graphically illustrated that sex can be both safe and sexy. As a community, I think we have turned the corner, away from the old notion that "sex is all that counts" or "more sex is always better sex." We are now fully exploring, and validating the worth of, all the aspects of our humanness; this is exciting.

While I do not advocate celibacy (it may be the option some choose), I still feel our sex establishments could become the "havens for safe sex" that would enable us to use them without concern about the possible transmission of disease. Such an outcome would require a consensus within the community that safe sex principles are both possible and desirable. Perhaps we have not reached that consensus yet but we have come a long way in just two years and we have much to be proud of. As you indicated, "the path to safe sex will be longer for some than for others" but most of us have begun to take at least those first tentative steps. Articles such as yours can help us to look more closely at this "path" and take another step or two. Many thanks.

Richard L. Andrews, M.D.
P.S. I think we would all benefit from a similar story on the sex/clubs and similar establishments. Is the same progress being made?

Changes at the Baths

Thanks for...the article on the baths. I found it very enjoyable to read and it provided good information—a full and rich account. Our May, 1984 data will be coming off the computer soon, and I believe it will corroborate your observations about increased awareness and use of safe sex practices. Although I haven't seen it for sure, by looking at the questionnaires, I found many who had gone to the baths in November had stopped going, so the baths may now be the province of the young, the unchangeable and the curious.

I particularly liked the italicized portions. You must have had a very busy week. I have also found bathhouse research to be tiring. I am very hesitant to go to the baths anymore because I suspect I'll run into a researcher in the hall and I already see too much of them.

What strikes me is the change since as late as March, I was in the bathhouses just prior to Silverman's announcement and business and body fluid were flowing. I watched one man in the 8th and H orgy room get fucked by 6-7 guys. Bang, bang, what's a condom. One week later Silverman started threatening to close the places, and their act cleaned up almost on the spot. For all the difficulty it has caused, it seems to me that the threat of public policy has already worked and the policy itself may be redundant if/when it occurs.

Sincerely yours,
Leon McKusick, MS

Bathhouses Adapt

As an out of town reader of Coming Up! I was very pleased to read your courageous article "Sex and the Baths." Speaking the truth is not always easy and there are many city officials who would prefer to ignore their real intentions for restricting sexual activity at the baths under the guise of public safety. Here in Santa Cruz where sex is by-and-large a private affair there is less ability to educate and develop collective support for safe sex at such a quick rate. How exciting to realize that bathhouses, which have been an integral part of gay inner city culture, can flourish and adapt to the needs of the community.

Mark Small
Santa Cruz

Sex at the Clubs

Your article in the recent Coming Up! was wonderful, clear and definitely correct. I attend Jacks Baths and still observe much of the same old sex being done. Many of the gentlemen who attend Jacks and San Francisco Baths (Ellis) are older and say that they are too old to get AIDS. As you know, there has not been a survey of men past 45 showing AIDS. Much of the myth is that men past 60 don't have sex, so unfortunately a survey hasn't been taken or in any event shown in the newspaper.

You stated that you hadn't taken a survey of the private shops. Please hang on to your hat if you decide to survey them. I know that the Academy still has glory holes and continues to allow sucking/fucking whenever and wherever available. The funny thing is that they distribute a condom and the safe sex literature when you register. Apparently the only place that does. The T-Room Theatre still has their backrooms, which are pitch black and still allow sucking and fucking. Even though the T-Room Theatre has removed every other row of seats it still makes it perfect to drop on one's knees and suck cock. In fact the back row was removed and it enables people to stand up against the wall and carry on.

Please do your survey on these backrooms which would include the Savages which, as you know, have a maze of glory holes downstairs.

I think we are addressing the baths and seeing the decline of unsafe sex through rose colored glasses when nothing has changed in the private clubs. Unfortunately this is where people are beginning to go because of the limited sex at the baths.

The baths may be slow but the backrooms/T-Room Theatre, Savages and Academy are packing them in like crazy.

Thank You,
Rodger
San Francisco

Rick Osmon and Michael Helquist reply:

Rodger's comments about the high risk sexual activity that occurs at times in some of the city's gay sex clubs has been verified both by our personal observations and by the reports from some club patrons. Without mean ingful encouragement from owners, no consensus to practice safe sex is likely to develop at the sex clubs. Community support and pressure are needed to maintain environments more conducive to safe activities.

Rodger also states his belief that many older gay men feel that they have little reason to be concerned about AIDS because it's a "young man's disease." The national statistics from the Centers for Disease Control (CDC) reflect a steady 9% of AIDS diagnoses among those over 49 years of age. In late October, 1983 the year reflected 229 cases nationally; by June of this year that number rose to 415. In San Francisco the percentage for those over 49 years has fluctuated from 7% to 8% for the last several months from 35 cases in March to 43 in late June.

While the numbers speak for themselves, some men newly diagnosed with AIDS haven't found much comfort in previous beliefs that "it can't happen to me."

Personal and Informative

Congratulations on an informative and personal article. At first it appears as just another journalist's account of having a "good time" at the baths, as I'm sure you got criticized on. A New York Native reporter did the same thing you did, but not as well. I'm glad you were honest in writing about your experiences in "laymen's" terms. I thought the selection of cases as well as aspects of the baths was different...Writing should primarily inform and educate, while at the same time entertaining. I'm glad you broke down the personal accounts away from separate informative articles on risk reduction guidelines, bathhouse comparisons, and fishing...and more power to Mr. Osmon for writing about this. I, for one, agree 100% with your recommendation that it should be re-evaluated.

Steve Ong
New York City

Littlejohn on Bathhouses

July 22, 1984

I think it is important to challenge at least two of the implications in Allan Berube's article "Don't Save Us From Our Sexuality" (Coming Up!, April 1984).

1. Mr. Berube says: "Such a climate breeds desperate attempts to find simple solutions. Stop AB-1, blame the victims, become monogamous or celibate, close gay restaurants, pass new anti-sodomy laws." Note the rather nasty prejudice in this sentence. Monogamy and celibacy are lumped together with stopping AB-1, closing gay restaurants, and passing new anti-sodomy laws as "desperate" attempts to deal with AIDS. Monogamy and celibacy are sensible and responsible courses of action for those who choose them. Even before AIDS, many gay persons chose to be monogamous (or even celibate). Why does Mr. Berube (and others) put down these options? Promiscuity is not the sine qua non of being gay.

2. Mr. Berube discusses the 1900 bubonic plague epidemic in San Francisco's Chinatown at some length. He then says: "The gay community in 1984 is as vulnerable to health panics and scapegoating as was the Chinese community in 1900." The implication of Mr. Berube's article is that public health officials somehow victimized Chinese people during the 1900 bubonic plague epidemic and that gay people are subject to similar victimization during the AIDS epidemic. Mr. Berube distorts the history and meaning of what happened during the 1900 bubonic plague epidemic in San Francisco.

There was a bubonic plague epidemic in San Francisco's Chinatown March 1900 to February 1904 (121 cases with 118 dead, almost all Chinese). At first the existence of this epidemic was denied by the governor, the mayor, and almost all of the city's press. The proper public health measures to combat this epidemic were proposed by the local and federal public health officials but they were opposed by politicians and commercial interests that did not want to admit that there was bubonic plague in San Francisco. One medical historian has said: "The account of the bubonic plague in San Francisco is one of the darkest pages in the history of North American medicine. It is the story of a relentless fight by a small group of doctors, not against a dread disease, but against recalcitrance, stupidity, and greed." (Silvio J. Onesti, Jr. in "Plague, Press, and Politics," Stanford Medical Bulletin, Feb. 1955).

Although Chinese were victims of extreme racial prejudice before and after the 1900-1904 epidemic they were not being victimized by public health officials attempting to combat that epidemic.

The lesson to be learned from the 1900-1904 bubonic plague in Chinatown and from the 1907-1909 bubonic plague epidemic in San Francisco outside of Chinatown (160 cases, 77 deaths) is the importance of public health measures to combat communicable diseases and how public opinion, politicians, and community leaders deter or contribute to the success of those public health measures.

Sources for the history of the 1900 and 1907 bubonic plague in San Francisco are: Eradicating Plague from San Francisco (March 31, 1909 Frank Morton Todd) (Report of the Citizens' Health Committee); Plague, Press, and Politics (Silvio J. Onesti, Jr., Stanford Medical Bulletin, Feb. 1955); Plague in San Francisco in 1900 (Loren George Lipsen, MD, Annals of Internal Medicine, Aug. 1972).

(I would be glad to furnish copies of the above to anyone who requests same.)

Larry Littlejohn
San Francisco

Allan Berube Responds:

Larry Littlejohn's historical lesson from the plague panic of 1900, so far as I can tell, is that the plague spread because no one followed public health measures. Public health officials, he maintains, were the "good guys"; they fought a lonely battle against "recalcitrance, stupidity and greed" and in no way "victimized" the Chinese population.

There are several problems with this argument. It is true that Mayor Schmitz, Governor Gage, the State Board of Health, the press and big business all denied that a plague existed in San Francisco. New York newspapers were running scary headlines that the "Black Plague" was creeping into America from San Francisco, so these angry and powerful men reacted with denials to protect their interests. The Board of Health was nearly alone in recognizing that the plague existed, but this does not mean, as Larry Littlejohn asserts, that the Chinese people "were not being victimized by public health officials."

These white physicians were as guided by "extreme racial prejudice" as other public officials. How else can we explain their attacks on Chinese medical practices while denying Chinese San Franciscans access to City Hospital? What was the medical rationale for quarantining the Japanese in California when the plague was attacking Chinese people? What were the medical reasons for their plans to intern all Chinese San Franciscans in warehouses, to set their homes, schools, stores, pharmacies and clinics on fire and then saturate the ashes with poisonous acids?

Public health officials had no cure for the plague and little knowledge about how it was transmitted. They reacted, instead, with desperate measures based on fear and racism, attempting to protect white San Franciscans by scapegoating the Chinese community and their alleged "unwholesome odors."

The implication that we are to draw from Larry Littlejohn's reading of history, of course, is that AIDS has spread in San Francisco because the "recalcitrance, stupidity and greed" of our communities and leaders have prevented gay men from obeying medically sound public health measures. This is both inaccurate and unfair.

First of all, nearly every public health department in North America has found no medical evidence for banning sex in bathhouses. Our city's proposed sex ban, therefore, reflects San Francisco politics and a general squeamishness about sex more than any medical or public health consensus.

But more importantly, no matter what positions any of us have taken on sex in the bathhouses, I think we have shown a remarkable adaptability, intelligence and concern when it comes to following preventive health measures. We gay men have been educating ourselves about AIDS and safe sex practices, and have made unprecedented and dramatic changes in our sexual behavior both inside and outside the baths (as evidenced by the radical drop in anal gonorrhea cases and the bathhouse sex survey published in last month's Coming Up!). If every gay man has not yet totally converted to safe sex practices, the solution is to provide more safety, more support and better information for making these difficult choices. Anything that encourages the cycle of fear, guilt, panic and scapegoating—from closing the baths to quarantining the sick and dying—can only make that task even harder. Attacking our sexual institutions and blaming men who are not monogamous, celibate or who have sex outside the home, as some have done, makes us all the more fearful and suspicious of each other, more eager to identify traitors, and more desperate of our right to exist as sexual people.

In 1900, residents of Chinatown felt compelled to hide their sick and dying in basements because they correctly perceived that they were under attack. These fearful actions helped no one. In 1984, the danger is that a climate of fear and guilt will force us to hide our sexual practices from each other for fear of being blamed for AIDS. Sexual scapegoating will only paralyze us, make us more isolated, pit us against each other, and prevent us from making the changes that will save our lives.

Hookers Convene in S.F.

By Sean Reynolds

The Democrats were not the only ones to hold a convention in San Francisco during the month of July. The Crisco Disco also hosted The International Hookers Convention which met at the Valencia Rose from July 9th through July 12th.

COYOTE (Call Off Your Old Tired Ethics) sponsored the convention, which brought together about fifty women (each day) from all over the country. Prostitutes, ex-prostitutes, non-prostitutes and prostitute advocates met to discuss and challenge ways in which outdated laws which oppress all women, not just prostitutes, affect their everyday working lives. A goal of the convention was to begin formulating what the reality could be if prostitution were decriminalized. "In the past we merely agonized about the injustices done to prostitutes; now we are organizing for what the future could be for prostitutes after prohibition," said Margo St. James, head of COYOTE.

The convention site was kept secret in order to protect the anonymity of many of the women who are still in the closet about their prostitution. Because prostitution is still illegal in this country, many women were very aware of the risks taken even by attending a conference such as this. Because of the stigma associated with prostitution, a lot of the women did not want their pictures and history blasted across newspapers.

It is illegal to exchange sex for money in forty-nine of the fifty states in this country. Women and men are arrested for doing it every day. Plain and simple. The laws against prostitution have not protected women and children from exploitation and abuse as they were designed to do (enacted in the early part of this century); the laws have not eliminated or reduced the amount of prostitution or related abuse. Instead, the laws have acted as a corrupting element for law enforcement agencies.

The political analysis of the Position Paper on Prostitute Rights which came out of the International Hookers Convention states:

The main function of the laws prohibiting prostitution is the social control of all women and people of color, and the laws are discriminatorily enforced against these populations. Prostitutes' rights is an issue of

Mala Mana Rodriguez

On July 4th, 1984, when all seemed right with the world and the day sang with festivities and excitement, our friend, Mala Mana Rodriguez, Chicana, timbalera, musician and dreamer, lost her life in a bicycle accident on San Francisco's Fisherman's Wharf. We who loved Mala loved her relentless spirit, that spirit that dreamt of bringing women together to play music... to play salsa... and Orquesta Sabrosita was born. We who respected Mala witnessed her growth, her coming of age as a half-breed Latina, proudly reclaiming her Chicana identity and overcoming the barriers that separate women of color... our pain, mostly. She will be sorely missed.

Ambar Canales, a songwriter who shared much music and joy with Mala, once put down some words when watching Mala perform her magic. The following is an excerpt.

Timbalera,
Que bien es oír tu musica,
En mi mente hay palmeras
Meciendose al compas de tu ritmo...
...Tu todo lo unes
Llegando a completar
Llenando al aire con
La magia de tu creatividad.

Timbalera,
What joy it is to hear your music!
In my mind there are palm trees
Swaying to the rhythm of your music...
...You bring it all together
Coming to fulfillment,
Filling the air with
The magic of your creativity.

self determination; we have the right to control our own bodies. Sexual stigmatization oppresses prostitutes and by extension, serves to keep all people from exercising choice about their personal lives.

This should be very familiar to many gay and lesbian activists.

There was a noticeable absence of many women of color at the convention. One black woman expressed concern and shared that, as with everything, economics stood in the way of many women of color being there. She felt that many of the women, the black ones in particular, were too busy on the streets making money and did not have time to participate in a four-day convention which would literally take food out of their mouths. There were no protests to this assumption, and many of the women felt that better outreach needed to occur in order to insure better representation during the next convention. The convention was not free, although as with much that women participate in, it was based on a sliding scale. Some women came the first day, and brought another woman with them the next. No one was turned away due to lack of money.

The subjects of the convention ranged from Solidarity within the Sex Industry, Organizing and Ethics, to Health and Business Agreements. Many of the discussions were hot ones. Not all prostitutes think alike. On the last day of the convention, women broke into small groups of prostitutes, ex-prostitutes, and non-prostitutes in order to get a sense of the differing opinions. What came out of those groups is the Position Paper on Prostitute Rights. This position paper is a recommendation from COYOTE and all of the participants at the convention.

Many of the women who participated in the convention left with a sense of solidarity and a feeling that at last they too could become a part of the human rights movement. Margo St. James says, "This meeting has brought all levels of working women together. The Prostitutes Rights issue is the mortar for the REAL Rainbow Coalition; that's why we're proclaiming '84 the Year of the Whore!'"

Convention Week in San Francisco

Delegates and Demonstrators Make History When the Democrats Convene

BY ALEXIS X. JETTER

Despite the Democrats' best efforts, there were spontaneity and uncanned political drama at the Democratic National Convention last month. The raw and sometimes comical moments unfolded not at the monolithic building-block podium, but in small huddles off the floor, in crowded hotel rooms on Union Square, and in chance meetings on the street. National Gay Task Force Director Ginny Apuzzo looked up from her coffee cup at a downtown cafe one morning as a burly Texan ambled in wearing an "I Love Queens" button. An impromptu wheelchair march rolled down Market Street to Moscone Center, where disabled speakers vowed to form "truth squads to trail Ronald Reagan around the country." And in the 69-member Lesbian and Gay Caucus, delegates from 20 states alternately locked horns and arms in debates ranging from revolution in Central America to floor banner strategy.

The platform is historic, the nomination of Geraldine Ferraro as Vice President likely to change the face of American politics. But those milestones had already been reached when the delegates, alternates and stringers-on arrived in San Francisco. The issue that most consumed gay and lesbian delegates was visibility, second only to unity in convention rhetoric. (Unity was the byword at the podium, visibility the focus in the caucus cell meetings.) And every issue, idea and position had to be distilled into a visual image for the great blinking eye of the media.

Visibility—and Invisibility

"Four years ago, to get some visibility at the convention, we nominated Mel Boozer for Vice President," Apuzzo reminded the caucus in a July 14th pre-convention session in the Castro District's Douglas School. "Practically nobody knew it. History was made—and our invisibility [rendered it] practically nonexistent in the history books. That will never happen to gays and lesbians again."

Without access to the podium, however, gay visibility had to rely on proxy speakers, whose performance was subject to hot disagreement. Caucus discussions often ran to the number of times lesbians and gays were mentioned by name, "whether speakers used the 'l' word and the 'g' word," quipped Maine delegate Dale McCormick, or whether the acknowledgment was simply "orientation," as New York Governor Mario Cuomo did in his

From the Democratic Platform:

"...All groups must be protected from discrimination based on race, color, sex, religion, national origin, language, age, or sexual orientation. We will support legislation to prohibit discrimination in the workplace based on sexual orientation. We will assure that sexual orientation per se does not serve as a bar to participation in the military. We will support an enhanced effort to learn the cause and cure of AIDS, and to provide treatment for people with AIDS. And we will ensure that foreign citizens are not excluded from the country on the basis of their sexual orientation."

keynote address on opening night.

Minnesota Mondale delegate Dennis Miller, who said he felt "personally betrayed" by Cuomo's "generic secondary gesture that nobody heard but us," announced his intention (later rescinded) to switch his vote to Jesse Jackson. Rick Stafford, another Mondale Minnesotan, echoed his sentiments. "Cuomo saying 'orientation' is like saying 'America' and expecting blacks and other minorities to feel included."

"That was the intention of that word being there," countered Caucus co-chair Peter Vogel of New York. "If we don't recognize that then we're missing an opportunity."

Jackson

Jesse Jackson's speech to the convention the second night, which had Mondale, Jackson and Hart delegates alike crying and swaying, earned him a special place in the hearts of the lesbian and gay contingent. "It was marvelous," said Harvey Milk Club president Carole Migden, a Mondale alternate. "As a Jew, I was moved because I've been most distressed by anti-Semitic inferences throughout the campaign. He said forgive me, and I did wholeheartedly.... And there was a general inclusion of lesbians and gay men that wasn't just a rhetorical or cursory mention because of a political debt. We were woven legitimately into his speech."

"I'll tell you," she added. "I think it could've been a William Jennings Bryan night."

Other gay delegates shared her tugs. "It's very tempting" to switch to Jackson, confessed New York Hart delegate Wendy Gould after the speech. "But I represent a group of New Yorkers who voted for Hart. It wouldn't be fair," she said.

Hart

The power of Jackson's speech wasn't entirely lost on Hart and Mondale campaign staff. "We're getting leaned on very heavily," said Dale McCormick, Hart delegate from Maine. "They're sending out the big guns,"—including Connecticut Sen. Christopher Dodd, chief Hart backer.

But big guns couldn't help Hart's speech. "It just didn't ring," Apuzzo said. "If you believe that you are qualified you ought to be able to tell your people why they should vote their own conscience."

Sixteen gay and lesbian Hart delegates, angered that neither he nor his endorsers mentioned their community—as all candidates had been asked to do in a telegram sent by the caucus—fired off a letter to Hart on July 19, expressing "disappointment" that he "failed to recognize our participation in the Democratic Party and the needs of our community."

"We perceive this omission as insensitive and a missed opportunity to rally members of our community for your support," the letter concluded. It was signed by S.F. Supervisor Harry Britt, National Association of Gay and Lesbian Democratic Clubs Co-chair Lynn Mattingly, Santa Cruz Mayor John Laird, Alice B. Toklas Democratic Club Political Action Chair Connie O'Conner, and former Harvey Milk Democratic Club president Gwen Craig, among others.

You would think they spent $3.4 million on security...

There were 1500 San Francisco police officers, 200 Sheriff Deputies, a large retinue of Secret Service agents, and Andy Frain security guards, an intricate anti-counterfeiting credentials system, and one bag lady.

She slipped past them all. The spry 50-year-old German bag lady, well known in certain circles for her private collection, thought she really had a find the other day when she spotted the shiny, decaded ticket on the sidewalk near Moscone Center.

"She noticed that all these people going into the building had these tags on," said a local social worker who declined to be identified. "She thought there might be some food and something interesting to collect there."

So, over the pigtails and around the neck, and the intrepid packrat set off for Moscone Center, delegate pass flapping at her neck.

"The garbage cans were probably her top priority," confided the social worker. "She got past the guards, and was pretty quiet until she got inside."

Once inside, though, troubles set in. Two factors militated against the bag lady's success: she didn't speak a word of English, and she was stone deaf.

"They apparently thought she was speaking some Alaskan dialect," chuckled her friend. "They kept pushing her in the direction of the Alaska delegation." She stood with the delegation for a while, unnoticed. But finally, with all the jostling and heat, and no garbage can in sight, "she got irritated."

"Where is the food? Where is the food?" she demanded over and over in her native German, yelling at the top of her lungs, over the drone of the speeches, under the glare of TV lights, right smack in the middle of the Moscone Center floor.

Guards grabbed her and tried to haul her, kicking and screaming, off the floor. "She kept telling them off in German," said the social worker. And in one final, last-ditch effort, she grabbed a hot dog out of the mouth of an unsuspecting onlooker.

Coming Up! contacted Lieutenant George Huegle of the SF Police Department who assisted in overseeing internal security at the convention. According to Huegle, a number of "our people" took the woman to the Psychiatric Emergency Services (PES) at San Francisco General Hospital.

The police officers told the hospital staff that the woman would have to remain there for the convention's duration or be sent to jail. Although she didn't constitute a threat to herself or anyone else—PES criteria—staff decided to take her in. According to a source at the hospital, "She wasn't crazy, just confused and very curious, and they [the officers] had taken her deafness as willful [resistance]."

One of the ward doctors spoke German, and as the two women bellowed at each other in the hall, the story tumbled out.

Which caused our boys in blue no small embarrassment, "Is that a big story?" Huegle demanded of Coming Up! testily. "It's no different from a ballgame—someone comes out, says 'Hey do you want to go in?' I don't think there's anything to it."

"The important thing is," he concluded huffily, "How does someone get in? This is a person with a mental problem. She's not a rational person."

Perhaps. But as her social worker friend said, with more than a touch of pride, "politicians aren't going to feel very safe if this bag lady can just deposit herself on the convention floor."

Other Hart backers, such as Andy Bates of Seattle, refused to sign on. "He's come a long way, from bare minimum support to co-sponsoring the gay civil rights bill. I'm going to continue to push him, but I'm certainly not going to send him a telegram condemning him," he said.

Blacks and Gays Push Fritz

Mondale, for whom the platform was both a shield and a trump card, deflected much criticism of his own silence on gay and lesbian issues by agreeing to have endorsers such as National Organization for Women president Judy Goldsmith address those concerns, and by pointing to the platform as "his personal commitment to the civil rights of gays and lesbians," Mondale staffer Nikki Heidepriem said.

But on at least one key issue, Mondale point men on the Rules Committee tried to hold the line against lesbian and gay gains. Karen Clark, openly lesbian Minnesota State Senator and member of the Democratic National Committee (DNC) Rules Committee, sponsored a measure to ensure that an open lesbian or gay is appointed to all the standing DNC committees. It passed. ("They must have been in a liberal mood," Clark said.)

But later the leader of the Mondale floor campaign moved to reconsider. According to Clark, the way the Rules Committee was run, "when [Mondale's man] raised his thumb, everybody voted yes. When he put his thumb down, everybody voted no."

Clark says, "Maxine Waters, [head of Jackson campaign and California state legislator] came storming back and said to me,

'if he does that we're going to pull our whole agreement!' " Waters walked right back to Mondale's man and, says Clark, "within 30 to 45 seconds, he stood up and said, 'Mr. Chairman, we would like to withdraw our motion to reconsider.' "

What was it Waters said? "I told him if you won't support us then [the Jackson campaign] will just double-back on you and not support something you're trying to do," Waters told Coming Up! "That's all—just a little mild threat," she chuckled.

Mondale's liaison to the lesbian and gay community, Nikki Heidepriem, acknowledged that Jackson's commitment to gay rights was building pressure on Mondale to be a more forceful advocate of these concerns. "[The Jackson speech] will probably make the problem worse," she said. "Jackson has been good all along," partly because, Heidepriem believes, his supporters are progressives. "That's in stark contrast to our campaign, which has to build a national constituency," she said.

Mondale forces are planning a joint voter registration drive and voter targeting campaign with the National Association of Lesbian and Gay Democratic Clubs and other groups, recognizing that the gay vote is critical in 1984. But again, according to Clark, it was Maxine Waters who rose to stop any "watering down" of that commitment. "You know, we can find lesbians and gays when we want money for our campaigns. We can find lesbians and gays when we want volunteers for our campaigns. I think we should find lesbians and gays when we want to do outreach and build the party."

That conservative impulse in the Mondale campaign reared its head in its attempt to reclaim "traditional American values" from the Republicans. Speakers like Senator Paul Sarbanes of Massachusetts and Governor Mario Cuomo of New York continually hammered home the message that Reagan was the "radical." A short Mondale film that preceded his July 19 acceptance speech showed a folksy Mondale camping with his freshly scrubbed family, frying fish while his kids devoured watermelon and his wife exclaimed "He's an expert at frying fish and we're experts at eating it." It reminded some delegates of the Norman Rockwellish Reagan ads now making their way onto the airwaves.

But there was room, at least in Geraldine Ferraro's call, for the family to be expanded. "Restore those values, of love, of caring and partnership, by including those beliefs that differ from our own," she told the convention. Tolerance more than embrace, but her message was welcomed by caucus members. "We're going to have a lot of fun in the next few months helping the Democrats expand their definition of family," Supervisor Harry Britt said at a caucus press conference on the convention's final day.

"I find it very ironic that on the day Mondale announced his choice of Geraldine Ferraro, Ronald Reagan was in a cave—a Mammoth one."
July Goldsmith, NOW President

Ferraro

Caucus co-chair Gwen Craig was clearly buoyed that Ferraro, whose record on lesbian and gay rights has been spotty, chose to announce her support for the gay rights plank of the platform at a meeting of the Lesbian and Gay Political Action Club of Queens (a lovely redundancy) two weeks before the convention. Response to Ferraro ranged from wildly enthusiastic—"I think Gerry Ferraro is spectacular—she doesn't pander, she's honest and sincere. I'm going to work my tits off for her," (Lynn Mattingly) to thoughtful—"If we got rid of Ronald Reagan and elected a woman Vice President at the same time, it would be one of the greatest moments in all our lives," (Bill Kraus, aide to Sala Burton), to hopeful but guarded optimism from those who've dealt with her—not always successfully—in the past. "She's a liberal, a union person, and if I were just an ordinary straight white person I'd love her," said New York Human Rights Commissioner Joyce

Hunter, a who lives in Ferraro's district in Queens. "However, I have other issues. As a Black person, I don't go for her stand on busing. As a mother, I can understand how you don't want your small kids being bused all over the city. But in New York, there's no other way. I'd rather my kids get bused and get a quality education."

Ginny Apuzzo, who said she was "thrilled" with Ferraro's nomination, and who trusts that "she is a woman in process, as we all are," said that Ferraro's opposition to the District of Columbia Sexual Assault Bill in 1982 was a "grave error for Gerry." The omnibus bill would have repealed sodomy law and established home rule for D.C., among other provisions. Vickie Monrean, Director of the Gay Rights National Lobby (GRNL), said that Ferraro told the D.C. Gertrude Stein Democratic Club last April that she opposed the bill because it would have lowered rape penalties and the age of consent.

Ferraro also said there was inadequate information given her about lesbian and gay concerns. "She should have gotten the message," Monrean said. "The work that the gay community in Washington did was good work." Steve Clement, GRNL Legislative Assistant, noting that the Moral Majority "did a lot of lobbying on the bill" and effectively made it a vote on lesbian and gay rights, said it was "unlikely that she didn't know" the bill's implications for gay rights.

Still, Monrean stressed, "We have to take her at her word." Ferraro has agreed to vote for the gay civil rights bill, but has stated that her constituency is too conservative to allow her to co-sponsor it. "Well, now Geraldine Ferraro has a national constituency," Monrean said, "and GRNL is going to ask her to co-sponsor the measure. We think her name on the bill will be very important—and we need her to make visible statements in support of the platform as well."

GRNL's Steve Clements stressed that Ferraro had a strong record on supporting AIDS funding and had three times stood with GRNL against the McDonald Amendment, which would have barred the Legal Services Corporation from defending lesbians and gays.

Lesbians and Other Women

Lesbians stayed largely on the sidelines at the Women's Caucuses held each morning at the Westin St. Francis, where affirmative action and dual primaries were the major matters of contention. "We're dealing primarily with racial issues," said one observer. Vicki Monrean, GRNL Director, was able to command 30 seconds at the microphone to reaffirm lesbians' commitment to the platform and candidates, but no openly lesbian woman sat on stage (with the likes of Bella Abzug and Gloria Steinem) and no lesbian issues were discussed. Monrean, along with NOW Lesbian Rights Director Christine Riddiough, claimed some responsibility for not having pressed for a presence at the event.

Lesbians at the grandiose Salute to American Women at the San Francisco Opera House were less forgiving. Bella Abzug said "sexual preferences" in her address, and Gloria Steinem eked out "lifestyle," but that was about it for easily 20 speeches and three hours on women's progress since Eleanor Roosevelt. "Lifestyle?" Harvey Milk Political Action Chair Catherine Cusic deapanned. "What are we talking about—French cooking?"

"The truth is I'm shocked that the Democratic National Committee is ahead of the Women's Caucus," she said.

Mondale and Ferraro chose the event for their first joint appearance in San Francisco. As they were ushered onto the stage, the crowd roared and leapt to their feet. "There was a lot of hugging and kissing on stage, but not amongst they dykes," observed Emily Culppeper of Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Then, in a move that struck this reporter with profound significance at the time, Mondale pushed out a small pedestal for Ferraro to stand on so that they could wave to the crowd from roughly equal height.

Some of the nearly 100 women on stage took the opportunity to get some shots in at the Reagan Administration. "Oh! They're

Voices Inside/Voices Outside, or Platform vs. Platform

Between 20,000 and 50,000 people gathered outside Moscone Center on Monday night, July 16th, to demand a strong Democratic peace platform and to flex the arm of a coalesced freeze, anti-intervention, and social justice movement that rally organizers hope to keep cemented through the November elections and beyond.

The Vote Peace in '84 addressed by Rev. Jesse Jackson, Helen Caldicott, Daniel Ellsberg, George McGovern, Frances Moore Lappe, and Maggie Kuhn, amongst others pressed a three-pronged platform: (1) Freeze and reverse the arms race; (2) Pursue a foreign policy of non-intervention; and (3) fund jobs and human needs.

Inside Moscone, the same issues were being addressed, but without the singleness of direction or purpose. The platform that emerged called for a nuclear freeze, but by a two-to-one margin, stopped short of making a no-first-strike commitment. It would halt the development of the MX, but whispers not a word about the Cruise and Pershing missiles. It condemns waste in the military budget, but reaffirms the need for increased conventional weaponry and training, and makes no commitment to cutbacks in military expenditures. A call for "substantial, real reductions in military spending over the next five years," a Jackson-backed minority plank, went down to a two-to-one defeat—largely the result of feverish floor activity by Mondale whips (Mondale himself often refers to limiting defense increases to 3 or 4 percent a year).

Accompanying these votes were speeches that lay the nuclear freeze down with strange bedfellows. In the same breath, Connecticut Representative Barbara Kennelly championed the freeze, while asserting that a no-first-strike policy "doesn't give the president the flexibility he needs to assure a safe and strong America," and that "giant cuts in defense spending could raise doubts about the Democratic Party and its commitment to peace."

On foreign policy, the platform again has two voices. It denounces Reagan's secret war in Nicaragua, and would end support for the contras and other paramilitary groups fighting there. But it would continue the flow of arms and money to El Salvador (channeled through the newly-elected President, not through the military, but the distinction in real terms is slight). That funding would hinge on elimination of death squads, "progress" toward human rights and land reform, and "serious" negotiations with "contending forces."

This is language already in the law—the Democrats have put no more teeth in it, and it has certainly proved no constraint to President Reagan.

There is a refreshingly single voice, however, in an arena that hasn't heard one in years: human rights. Both in the platform, and in Geraldine Ferraro's acceptance speech, is a commitment to fight for human rights in "Chile as well as Afghanistan, Poland as well as South Africa."

—Alexis X. Jetter

Helen Caldicott

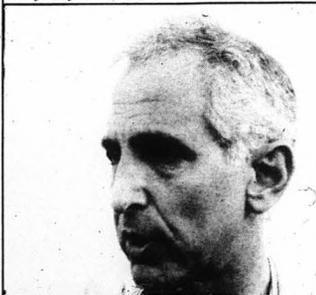

Founder, Physicians for Social Responsibility:

"There is only one issue for me and that is to prevent nuclear war. I don't get involved in any other issue because my position is very, very tenuous. The majority of Americans at this time are in a conservative mood. It's hard enough to get them involved in this issue, let alone in any other. The only way you get them involved in the freeze is to talk about their children being vaporized and bring it home to them. But you have to be very careful, very gentle, and very diplomatic... Rich and poor, gay and straight, black and white, Russians and Americans—this is the issue that unites everybody on earth."

Congressman Edward Markey (D-Mass):

"The nuclear arms race will be the issue. All other issues combined will be no more than a footnote in history. We're seeing a role reversal in 1984, the equivalent of the Moral Majority in 1980. The people who promote and most actively care about an issue win it."

Daniel Ellsberg:

"[On Mondale] 'He's easier to pressure, that's our only chance. His basic views are probably not that different from Reagan's. Every weapon that Reagan is pushing except the B-1 is a Democratic weapon pushed under Carter and Mondale. This movement—this anti-nuclear movement and broad movement against intervention—has brought Mondale, Hart and others to a point of repudiating those weapons. And frankly, there wouldn't be any real reason to expect that campaign promise to be kept if Mondale is elected this year, except for the process that has brought that promise to his lips: demonstrations, referendums, petitions, polls, and civil disobedience."

"[On gays and the peace movement] 'I remember back in 1972 sharing a stage with gay peace activists. Nixon was drawing on machismo as an organizing tool for imperialism. The gay definition of maleness was a very political challenge to imperialism."

Arnaldo Ramos, U.S. Representative,

Democratic Revolutionary Front, El Salvador:

"[On coalitions with Lesbians and Gays]

"First, many gays and lesbians have been working side by side with us in this country struggling for justice. We have learned not only to co-exist with them, but to appreciate the determination and valor of these companeros and companeras. There is a solidarity based on the heat of the struggle. Second, we have also learned in this country the levels of oppression that modern society, and all traditional societies, exercise on human beings. To us, coming to San Francisco, sharing the same church, at times, with gays and lesbians has opened our eyes. And thirdly, we believe that the struggle for freedom has many levels and is going to take many different stages in the development of human beings. We want to create a society in El Salvador that is free of prejudice, capable truly of co-existing with other societies and other people different from us. The struggle of gays and lesbians in this country has told us 'Listen! you cannot discriminate, either in color, race, sex, or even sexual preference. So for us, it is a wonderful process of learning."

proud of the Republican women—both of them," jabbed Texas Democrat Ann E. Richards. "Poor Margaret Heckler," she continued, referring to Reagan's Secretary of Health and Human Services. "They're always pulling her from the Rose Garden to the press conference, to the Rose Garden and back again, just to get some female visibility."

Heavy-Handed Tactics

Mondale, after first opposing Hart's "peace plank" restricting U.S. incursions into Central America, dramatically reversed himself the night of the platform vote and accepted it into the majority report without a vote. A compromise affirmative action plank was also approved. But planks pushed by Jesse Jackson calling for a no-first-strike policy, a ban on dual primaries, and significant cuts in the defense department budget went down to resounding 2-to-1

"[Your sexuality] certainly isn't the business of anyone in government—at least not anyone that you're not currently dating."

defeats.

Delegates said Mondale whips were doing some intense "scrambling" the day of the vote (July 17), "putting lots and lots of pressure on Mondale delegates to vote against the minority planks," according to Wendy Gould, Hart delegate from New York. That pressure earned Mondale the enmity of many Jackson backers, like schoolteacher Dori Griffin of Memphis. "He could've really had the Jackson people behind him if he'd let his own people vote their conscience on at least one of the minority planks," she said. "If Mondale were as magnanimous in victory as Jackson was in defeat, he'd have no problem," she added.

Judging from remarks on the floor, Mondale is going to have an uphill battle getting Black—especially Black women's—support. "Were it not for Jesse Jackson saying support this ticket, I would not support it," said Alice Rae Sheffield, 50, of Phoenix, a Jackson alternate. "What's the difference if it's a Republican sticking the knife in you or a Democrat?"

Sheffield, like many other Black women at the convention, was angry with Mondale for not screening a Black woman for the VP post. In protest, some members of the Black Women's Caucus organized a nomination drive for Shirley Chisholm. Arkansas had just cast 3 votes for Chisholm when the baton got tossed to the New York State delegation, which moved to cut off the vote and nominate Geraldine Ferraro by acclamation. "We were protesting, in our own small way, and we weren't even permitted to do that," Sheffield said. "I understand it was cut off so Mondale could be on prime time," Griffith added.

Marguerite Archie-Hudson, a Black delegate from L.A., summed up Mondale's task. "The onus is on him," she said. "I'm a Democrat, and I will support the ticket. So will most of the people at this political convention. But these are political activists."

"It's up to Mondale to show the masses that he really is committed to the Rainbow program, which says that every person has the right to full participation in the political process, to a decent standard of living, adequate education, and to all those things that make it possible for people to both work and dream."

Disabilities Caucus

Disabled activists from across the nation gathered at the San Francisco Hilton on July 18th for a "disabilities caucus," then rolled down Market Street for a rally at Moscone Center. "We've been working on this issue for twenty years, and we've never come as far as we have in the last few days," the former director of California Department of Rehabilitation told a group of about 75.

Jesse Jackson focused on the disabled ("I'd rather have Roosevelt in a wheelchair than Reagan on a horse") and Ted Kennedy, Jr.'s moving address to the Convention (he is an amputee) gave disabilities issues a national visibility they have rarely received. Twenty-eight disabled delegates representing more than twenty states attended the Convention.

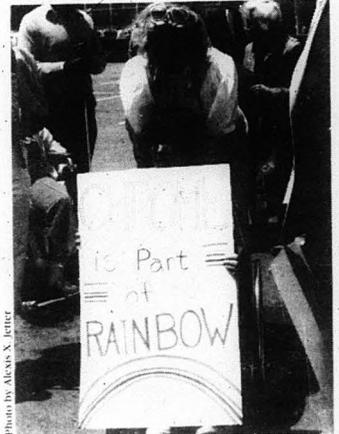

"Disabled people are beginning to make themselves felt as a constituency to be reckoned with," Hale Zukas of Berkeley spelled out on the letter chart posted on his wheelchair.

The disabilities caucus, held prior to the rally, was keynoted by Annie Glenn, wife of the astronaut-Senator. "I am one of you" the former "eighty-five percent stuttrer" told the capacity crowd, most of whom were seated in wheelchairs or perched on crutches.

"The Reagan Administration would have us believe that the answer 'to disabled problems' lies in more and better volunteering," she said. Calling that a "dangerous fantasy," Glenn traced the Reagan Administration attack on disabled programs' funding since 1980.

"They've twice tried to abolish the Education for Disabled Children's Act, they've tried cutting its funding by thirty percent. And this year they're at it again," she said.

Grey Panthers founder Maggie Kuhn exhorted the crowd "to roll out of this room and take over the Hilton."

Several disabled people, however, couldn't make it into the overfilled room in the first place, striking a raw nerve for some.

"I will never go anywhere somebody else is excluded," said Jane Jackson, Oakland resident and long-time civil rights and disabilities activist. "They clearly knew that people couldn't get in. The basic issue of inclusion versus exclusion should have been the guide." Jackson, like many of the disabled activists at the rally, traces the San Francisco disabilities movement to the 1977 takeover of the Health Education and Welfare Building at United Nations Plaza, when 150 disabled people and their supporters occupied the offices of the western regional director for three and a half weeks, until President Carter signed regulations enforcing the 1973 Rehabilitation Act. She would like to return to those tactics.

"Leadership missed their opportunity to get us all into the street," she said. "Fence posts cause sores. I'd rather plant my wheels firmly in one place."

National March for Lesbian/Gay Rights

A Report from
The Children's Express

Views around the Parade: Everyone was wearing something anti-Reagan; some wore costumes mimicking him. We saw a few transvestites walking down the street—they were dressed up as women with high heels and dresses. A man came up to us to show us a dove—for peace. There were a lot of men and women embracing each other. For a while, we were marching in the middle of it. We saw cameras come in and focus on us; we were embarrassed. We think that they did that because they didn't expect to see kids marching in the middle of a gay/lesbian parade.

We had never been to a gay rally and we didn't know what it was going to be like. We didn't think there were going to be clowns or anything like that, but there were "clowns." Like the tall man wearing a mini skirt. Only he wasn't a clown at all. He was dressed up for symbolism. He was trying to make a statement to children. He told us he was beaten as a child because he was gay.

A lot of people just turn away and don't concern themselves. A lot of people have a bad attitude against gay people. We were standing there and we felt uncomfortable among them. We noticed a lot of people felt uncomfortable around them.

We were talking to some guy. We were talking in the midst of all this screaming and shouting. There were tons of people.

We asked him why he had come to this rally.

"I'm here because I am a gay man." He had a beard, his name was Gregg. We learned that for the most part gays and lesbians look like regular people. "I work with young people from all over the country. They have been thrown out of their homes. Or their parents have neglected them. They have nowhere to go. They are living on the streets because they have no job and no place to live. Most of those who were thrown out had been abused by their parents. We have one to two thousand young people living on the streets here every night. They sometimes get involved in prostitution and drugs."

Gregg works with runaways and beat-up children. He said some parents throw them out of the house because they cannot accept the fact that they are gay or lesbian.

A sign caught our eye. EVERY WEEK IN AMERICA GAY AND LESBIAN PEOPLE ARE KILLED BY BIGOTS. We asked its owner about the sign.

"Anti-gay violence is real, fourteen gay churches were burned or bombed by right wing extremist forces. It's the people like the KKK and the Falwell people who are against being yourself, against being what you are."

We weren't sure about him. He was a 17-year-old boy named Milos. He had his nose pierced three times. He had a rainbow headband and a bleached pony tail. He was wearing an anti-Reagan button. He was really thin. He said he had been "fooling around" since he was seven.

"Seven?" we asked.

"I had a hippie mother who showed me the world as it is. She opened my eyes to a lot of things that America is." He had a pretty distinct theory. "Ignorance is the key to most so-called violence."

Gay people having their rights taken away is the same as kids having their rights taken away. Milos said: "They don't take our opinions and feelings for truth, they just take them for granted."

He told us he was at the July 12 demonstration. He said when he was there some lady got her head bashed in by officer number 282. "Of course, I was there. Or else I wouldn't know what I was talking about." The issue is about gay and lesbian human rights. It was a demonstration against Jerry Falwell and the Moral Majority. Falwell says that if gays continue the whole society will be diminished.

"I asked the cop on Market Street what started all the violence at Union Square. She said, 'What violence? What are you talking about?' I said, 'Are you for or against Jerry Falwell?' She said, 'I am Jerry Falwell.' This was badge number 2019." Very shocked by this, we asked a cop on the street what he thought. He chuckled and said he guessed she was making a joke. Another cop didn't seem to think it was very funny.

But the question that stayed in our minds for a while was: is this demonstration absolutely necessary? We weren't sure. We do believe that people can be exactly what they want. We think we would also march for this right.

A long time ago it was taken for granted that only a male and a female would be attractive to each other, but now people see these two males or two females—some people aren't used to this.

America is going into this whole thing with gay and lesbian rights. Now people are still saying it's wrong and it's bad, but gradually, they are starting to address homosexuality as something that just exists.

It was strange. We were uncomfortable. But people can be what they want.

Milos: "It's not wrong. We're just born that way."

The Children's Express

They were the envy of every reporter over 5 feet.

Children's Express reporters made their way to the front of the crowd again and again, scoring exclusive interviews with Jesse Jackson, Gary Hart, and Mayor Feinstein, who declared Monday, July 9th, Children's Express Day.

The news service, established in 1975, and now carried by UPI for 2,500 newspapers in the United States and overseas, had 32 energetic 9- to 13-year-old reporters and 21 14- to 16-year-old editors scurrying about the city last month. They covered the National March for Gay/Lesbian Rights, interviewed leaders of the Campbells' Boycott, and provided gavel-to-gavel convention coverage.

"They had about fourteen convention press passes," muttered one envious local editor, who had only two.

What's their secret? "Kids can be blunt," explained Meredith Miller, 11, in a C.E. column. "Adults can't act naive. Kids can come right out and say 'Did you embezzle funds?'"

And they have asked.

In a much-celebrated 1976 interview with Chicago's Mayor Daley, one of the C.E. reporters interviewed him and asked about the Chicago convention of 1968. "He denied the riot ever happened," said Deborah Artman, Children's Express Editor and Chief. "He said someone made it up. Well, that was a pretty grave error." The C.E. banner headline screamed, "Daley: It Never Happened." That, and predicting Mondale as Carter's running mate, catapulted C.E. into the journalistic limelight in 1976; and it's been gaining steam ever since.

Headquartered in New York, Children's Express now has bureaus in the Bay Area, Salem, Massachusetts, Newark, New Jersey, and Tokyo, and is forming new bureaus in New Zealand and Australia.

The columns, which are transcripts of taped interviews, capture not only politicians caught a little off guard, but the childrens' unbridled opinions. Omri Elisha, 11-year-old reporter, asked Hart, "How do you feel about Mondale picking Ferraro over you?" Hart responded, "If I win the nomination, which I probably will, I'll pick her, too." To which Elisha concluded, "He probably just says that—oh, I'll pick her too—and he's going to pick some rabbit from Hoboken."

Diary of a Moral Majority Delegate

Am I My Brother's Keeper?

BY ANN HEITBRINK

Thank God they are only keeping brothers, since that leaves me free to continue with my own disordered manifestation of human nature.

For two days I wore a badge that said, "I am my brother's keeper!" through security checks at the Union Square Holiday Inn. That nameplate signified my belonging to the Moral Majority's Family Forum III. "A disordered manifestation of human nature" is one of the gentler definitions of homosexuality that I heard in those two days.

Before I ever got to the conference, I was apprehensive about being admitted. The organizers of the Family Forum had been less than encouraging to Coming Up! staff over the telephone, having been told that Coming Up! is a gay and lesbian publication. Coming Up! staff and friends and I did not know if walk-in participants would be screened in any way. For folks who tout traditional values, we should have known that the old adage, "Money talks," would prevail.

Standing in the registration line in my pantyhose and amateur makeup, a gentleman approached the man in front of me. The greeting began with "Welcome Brother John!" and continued with "I'm going to take care of this for you." As the newcomer was writing out a personal check to cover his "brother's" admission fee, I fondled my own $60 in cash and considered the Russian roulette I was once again playing with my own checkbook balance.

As he handed his "brother" the check, he asked John if he had seen "any" yet. John shook his head. His friend, clearly a quick-witted chap, quipped back, "Well, I hear they don't get up until noon anyway." Understanding chuckle. Here it goes, I thought to myself wondering if I was really ready for the next 36 hours.

*Do you remember the real America?
...when a boy was a boy and dressed like one
...when everyone didn't feel entitled to a college education...*

Jerry Falwell is a pretty simple man. He is the pastor of a large congregation, due to his television broadcast, the "Old Time Gospel Hour." His church has an 82 million dollar budget, and his biggest cities are Philadelphia, Los Angeles, Boston and New York. San Francisco is in his top 20. Jerry Falwell talks to a lot of people every week, but the real brains in the Moral Majority are people like Cal Thomas, syndicated columnist and a truly engaging speaker, Ronald Godwin, an educator and executive v.p. of the Moral Majority Foundation, and Newt Gingrich, a Georgia representative in Congress and advisor to the Free Congress Foundation.

Jerry Falwell has become a scapegoat of the New Right and the Moral Majority. Falwell is not the reason that the Moral Majority came to San Francisco. It is the men behind the scenes that brought Falwell and Phyllis Schlafly to San Francisco. They came here to use the media that had gathered in hordes for the Democratic convention.

There were plenty of non-Moral Majority types at the conference. One of them asked me near the end of the first day, "Why are they doing this? Just what is it they are accomplishing here?" She was truly baffled for a while.

The speakers and organizers of this conference were national figureheads of the Moral Majority and Free Congress Foundation (a Washington-based organization partial to "traditional values" and the New Right). The folks attending the Family Forum did not come from more than 100 miles away. The conference was neither wholly informational, nor was it a mobilization for action. A set of unremarkable resolutions were considered, covering the topics of the Forum. The passing of the resolutions was the only active thing that the participants of the Family Forum were asked to do. No Moral Majority membership card was checked at the door: I could have amended and voted on these resolutions, the press could have, and the San Francisco police who, patrolled inside the conference could have. The only real "work" of the conference was conducted so casually as to encourage a look elsewhere as to its more significant intention.

While I surmised that content was not what this conference was really about, the local Moral Majority members were pleased as punch to be involved in (what they thought were) such profound considerations. Since the heart of this movement is in the Southern United States, especially in and around Lynchburg, Virginia, the Bay Area members felt like some of the action was finally coming their way. They were excited by talks, they made amendments to the resolutions, they asked questions, provided testimony, and bought lots of literature. While the national Moral Majority leaders put on a show for the national media, they also fired up the constituency, all the while using them to complete the picture that was needed for the national media.

The organizational model within the Moral Majority is clearly hierarchical. There are the wizards on top, who make tactical, strategic decisions about organizational policy and activity. Then there is a vast constituency that adds in dollars and votes but is largely ignorant regarding organizational considerations. Most of the power is with a few people. This model fits the tradition of the white, protestant, capitalist people who make up the New Right.

...power-from-within is the power of the low, the dark, the earth; the power that arises from our blood, and our lives, and our passionate desire for each other's living flesh. And the political issues of our time are also issues of spirit, conflicts between paradigms or underlying principles. If we are to survive the question becomes: how do we overthrow, not those presently in power, but the principle of power-over? How do we shape a society based on the principle of power-from-within?

Starhawk, Dreaming the Dark

Football and military strategies were often referred to. Violent aphorisms (such as, F is for the idle FOOL who is whipped at school, or J is for JOB who felt the rod but blessed his God...) were recommended for alphabet learning over Sesame Street, because they develop "moral seriousness." Rape was commented upon as being "kind of in style today," by a social theorist analyzing his results from a

ing. I was not there publicly as a member of the press. I was not there as a Christian, or a wife, or a mother. I was not even there as a Republican or a Reagan supporter. Following a talk on the "New, Traditional Woman," a woman bounced up to me and bubbled over with her "Wasn't she [the speaker] wonderful?" I could hardly believe that this woman before me (she looked intelligent...) had swallowed that bullshit about how men were meant to make the "big" decisions and it was not the wife's position to object.

RELIGION IS TO THE MORAL MAJORITY
WHAT PAINT-BY-NUMBER IS TO ART
—placard at National March

I spoke to many of the Family Forum attendees. Conversations often went like this:

Me: So, how are you enjoying the conference?

One of them: Oh, I am enjoying it very much. My husband and I are getting so much out of it.

Me: Are you Moral Majority members?

One of them: Oh, yes. (pause) and you? Are you a Christian?

My response to questions like this one was always somewhat delayed. No matter how many times it happened, I still did not expect it. Likewise, with the enthusiastic woman following "The New, Traditional Woman" lecture, deep down in my heart, I just couldn't believe that these 300 people bought so completely into all that they were told in those two days.

Pre-registrants' name tags had been pre-printed, and the women's names were all written as "Mrs. Tom Jones." I thought I had really discovered an independent thinker when I noticed that one woman had written her own name below the printed one on her badge. I commented on it, and she said, "Well, I am Marcia and he is Tom." With my bubble still intact, I mentioned Connie Marshner's lecture (The New Traditional Woman) to her, and Marcia changed her tune. "Oh, I have to agree with that. My husband really is next to God."

God comes into conversation a lot for Moral Majority folks. It is hard to continue much of an exchange once God pops up. God is the standard around which right or wrong are measured. He fills up the hole of a donut called Morality.

Nat Hentoff spoke at the Family Forum III convention. Hentoff, a Village Voice columnist and well-established member of liberal camps, was introduced as an atheist. He spoke with moral conviction about the right to life of Baby Jane Doe and other infants born with defects that might be correctable by surgery but who are left to die by the medical establishment and disappointed parents. At the close of Hentoff's talk, questions centered largely on his atheism and the impossibility of his having such high moral impulses without a transcendent deity to attribute noble thoughts to. Hentoff stood firm on secular humanist ground, while he criticized the right-to-life movement for not including infanticide in its crusade.

Nat Hentoff's talk was noteworthy for another reason. It was this talk that members of the Livemore Action Group chose for the performance of a lesbian demonstration. In the middle of Hentoff's talk two women rose and began kissing. There was another couple behind where I was sitting. "They ought to be shot," was heard in the crowd. As Hentoff tried to continue his talk, another man dissented and yelled, "No, I want to watch." In a voyeuristic sort of way, I think the members of the Family Forum were somewhat pleased to have had a "bit of San Francisco" come to them, and to be able to have their security forces and police escort the spectacle out of reach.

I was confused by this action. Lying exhausted next to my lover the night before, I

Moral Majority: Agenda on the Right

FAMILY FORUM

Once again, Schlafly leaves bubby and kids behind as she travels the country preaching the sanctity of the family and the servitude of women.

On July 12 and 13, evangelist Jerry Falwell's Moral Majority held its Family Forum III in the Holiday Inn on Union Square. The convention drew 350 conservative supporters and thousands of demonstrators against the Moral Majority's potent mixture of fundamentalist religion and right-wing politics.

Falwell denied that he had brought Family Forum III to San Francisco to confront the city's gay community. "We're here because the Democrats are here," he said. Family Forum III drafted and voted on 12 "Pro-Family Resolutions" to be presented to the Democratic National Convention for inclusion in the Democratic Party Platform. "I long for the day when Republicans and Democrats will have platforms that support grass-roots values," said Falwell. A second session of Family Forum III will be held August 15 and 16 in Dallas, Texas, immediately before the Republican Convention there.

The Moral Majority is a lobbying and educational organization founded in 1979 by Falwell, its current president. Falwell, one of the so-called "television evangelists," is a Baptist minister whose television audience forms the core of the Moral Majority's membership and financial contributors, who number in the millions by some estimates. The Moral Majority and Falwell himself have brought public pressure to bear on such issues as anti-abortion legislation, prayer in the schools, anti-gay legislation, and the campaigns against the ERA and a nuclear freeze. Falwell recently announced a Moral Majority-backed campaign to register 2 million voters to counter Jesse Jackson's voter registration drives.

The conference was co-sponsored by the Free Congress Foundation, whose president, Paul M. Weyrich, officiated at many of the sessions. The Foundation is an arm of the Committee for the Survival of a Free Congress (CSFC), a tremendously influential conservative political action committee based in Washington, D.C. The CSFC was founded in 1973 by Weyrich, who has been one of the most influential figures in the growth of the New Right during the past ten years. Weyrich is a protégé of Colorado beer baron Joseph Coors. Coors himself, his family, and his executives were the biggest contributors to CSFC in its first year, and the Coors family has continued to contribute heavily to its funding.

Family Forum III featured about 20 speakers, many of whom are leading lights in the New Right. Topics of the convention's sessions included "I Am My Brother's Keeper," "Equal Pay for Unequal Work," "Dealing with Homosexuality," "Alternatives to Abortion," and "How the Liberal Welfare State Fails Children."

The best-known of the Forum's speakers were Falwell himself and Phyllis Schlafly, founder of Stop-ERA, one of the principal architects of the defeat of the Equal Rights Amendment, a radio commentator, and a crusader for conservative and anti-communist causes since her early support of Senator Joseph McCarthy.

The other speakers, though less well known than Falwell or Schlafly, constituted a galaxy of conservative heroes. Among them were Connie Marshner, one of the principal authors of the Family Protection Act, the New Right's attack on abortion, feminism, the redefinition of sexual roles, and gay rights; California State Assemblyman Alister McAlister, a leading opponent of AB-1, the recently defeated gay rights bill; and U.S. Representative Newt Gingrich of Louisiana, one of the New Right's bright young hopes in Congress.

In Family Forum III's first session, convention members and dozens of media representatives were treated to star turns by the convention's biggest names, Falwell and Schlafly.

Exuding confidence and charisma, Falwell delivered a glorified pep talk for conservatives. "We are winning," he declared, citing lowered divorce and abortion rates. "America is beginning to turn around...to turn to the right and up." The country, he claimed, is emerging from the influence of the sixties and seventies, "the dark ages of the 20th century," when draft protests, the live-in relationship, the homosexual relationship, and anti-establishment values became acceptable. Citing "20 million cases of herpes and the lowest SAT scores in history," Falwell declared that "a whole generation" has been "betrayed by their elders...The phenomenon here in San Francisco is the product of what went on in those two decades," he said.

Falwell combined this dark vision of the past

It's 7 a.m. The Moral Majority conventioners fill almost every table in Jim's. Their name tags are red, white and blue and carry the legend "I Am My Brother's Keeper."

Representative Newt Gingrich earns applause when he says of Mondale's picking Ferraro: "If he can't stand up to NOW [National Organization for Women], can you imagine him standing up to Chernenko?"

A bit of dialogue from the Moral Majority: Conventioneer #1: "I have a brother who's homosexual."

Conventioneer #2: "Does he know the truth?"

Conventioneer #1: "I don't know what the hell he knows!"

Phyllis Schlafly: "I happen to believe that the family is God's plan for society, but you could argue on purely materialistic grounds that the family structure is the way to prosperity."

A young woman in the audience, fervently: "Amen!"

In the hotel press room, a young red-haired gay man from Los Angeles is arguing with a vigorous woman conventioneer about gay teachers. It is his third argument in half an hour, but he's still going strong. The woman fires a last shot: "What if I don't want my children to be exposed to a homosexual teacher? You're talking to Mother Bear here!" She turns on her heel and leaves.

The liberal New York Times, the joke runs, would headline the imminent end of the world thus: "World Will End at 2 P.M.—Women and Minorities Hardest Hit." The conventioners crack up.

The Zim's cashier does have an aspirin. "What's the matter?" she says; "You too? That convention must be giving everyone a headache."

In Union Square, a mohawked punker's T-shirt says in big letters: "MILLIONS OF DEAD COPS."

"What are they demonstrating about?" asks a white-haired man with a slow smile. "Jerry Falwell? Is that the one that wants everyone to think the way he does? Poor thing. More to be pitied than censured, don't you think?"

A teacher from San Jose says to two other conventioners: "We have a superintendent who's gay. He's not out of the closet, but he is a homosexual. Well, the homosexuals in our school have been on Cloud 9 since that man got in."

Paul Weyrich is pink-cheeked, cherubic, like a gigantic 10-year-old who hasn't outgrown baby fat. He is deeply disturbed by comparisons of the Moral Majority to the Nazis and the Klan: "Statements like that are the worst sort of McCarthyism I can think of," he says. He talks about the demonstrators shouting outside the window: "Those people seem to believe that we really shouldn't have the right to be here."

Some demonstration placards: "Curb Your Dogma." "Registered Voters Make Great Lovers." "Drive the Nazi Demons Out." "Schlafly's A Slug. Falwell's Her Dirt."

The young man has blood on his shaved head. He's being encouraged by a young woman. The reporter says he'd like to ask a few questions. The young woman says, "Wait! What paper are you from?" The reporter says what paper he's from. "Let's see an ID," says someone else. "There are Family Forum people around," they explain. The young man says, "This blood symbolizes Schlafly, Falwell, the KKK. They're trying to build a racist USA, and we're trying to prevent that." "Did the blood come from being hit over the head by the police?" asks the reporter. "No, man, this is fake blood," says the young man.

Ladies Against Women: "Taking a lover of the same gender is as bad as taking a contraceptive; you're evading a sacred duty either way."

State Senator Mike Menning of Minnesota describes the defeat of a gay rights bill to conventioners: "We pulled together some of God's people, we asked the Lord for guidance. You know, in Minnesota, we have government prayer chains. I can make a phone call and within a few minutes have 80 people on their knees praying." The eerie thing is that Menning looks exactly like Walter Mondale.

Jerry Falwell praises the police handling of the demonstrations: "This is batting practice for next week." One or two people—reporters, probably—gasp audibly at the metaphor.

It's almost 6 p.m., and Phyllis Schlafly is still answering questions. The Channel 2 reporter's microphone is an inch from her face; the dazzling TV lights are on, but Schlafly is utterly self-possessed. She pauses a few seconds to think after each question, and then out flows a stream of words, clear, measured, reasoned. Mark Twain called it, "The calm confidence of a Christian with four aces."

"I was on the sidewalk, calling to Ann and Lisa who were being beaten in the street. I saw a way for them to come to the sidewalk. I heard the crack, then felt it on my head. Turning around, I saw a cop on horseback. He had already turned around and was hitting other people."

"Some people incite violence so [others] become committed revolutionaries for the Communist Party. Once you get hit by a police billyclub, you're a confirmed whatever. I don't remember it all from my college days, but something about the state being against the people."

—John Erlich, SFPD
Community Relations Detail

Politicians and police are still jockeying for position on who started the violence. Deputy Police Chief George Eimil told reporters at the scene that officers were being pelted by rocks and bottles, although no eyewitness has come forward to support that claim.

CBS news associate Don Hegstrom told Coming Up!, "It's a total lie. [The violence] was started by the police....I have this vivid image of this woman [Lucrecia Bermudez] being held in a headlock with police knees in her back. She was crying and very upset. I'll never forget it."

Supervisor Harry Britt asked Mayor Feinstein on July 17 for a report on police conduct during the demonstrations surrounding the Democratic National Convention. "No one should condone violence initiated by demonstrators and directed at officers. But city officials also have a responsibility to assure the public that the police are not initiators of violence against demonstrators," he said.

Congresswoman Sala Burton, who admitted that she didn't know any details about the July 12 protest, maintained that "when you have a mob, it's only human [for the police] to react. I wish we could get rid of mobs," she said.

San Francisco policeman John Erlich, interviewed at the July 16 Vote Peace Rally, had perhaps the most salient commentary. "The tactical division is trained to go out and do that—and they want to do that. You can't train people to that extent and expect them not to take action," he said.

"They stand there for hours and hours, and they're cooped up waiting for somebody to get out of hand so they can do what they've been trained to do."

SLOW MOTION:

BY ANNE FINGER

About 5:30 in the afternoon, the knot in my stomach had begun to untie itself. For the past three weeks, I'd been working on organizing a demonstration to protest the local Moral Majority's conference in San Francisco—running leaflets to the printers, typing up chant sheets, holding late night steering committee meetings around my kitchen table. Now, I was sitting in a rented wheelchair, with brakes locked to keep me from rolling down the Powell Street hill, across the street from the Holiday Inn convention site. Around me, people were chanting. "A woman's life is a human life; free abortion on demand," and "The Moral Majority builds for war/U.S. out of El Salvador."

The organizing committee had made a decision not to negotiate with police about when and where our demonstration would be held. Sidewalk demonstrations are legal without a permit and, along with a lot of other people, I felt it was important for us to assert that right. We called our demonstration without asking the cops' permission.

I wasn't surprised that the police were less than helpful with our action. An article in the Chronicle a few weeks before had hinted broadly that we were troublemakers and quoted a cop as saying that the police wouldn't be able to show their "usual patience." I had gone to one meeting a few days before with the police, not to negotiate, but to inform them what we were planning. On the day of the demonstration, I was one of two people acting as police liaison.

We had been met by a fairly strong show of force when we arrived. As we had expected, we weren't allowed to march in front of the Sutter Street entrance of the hotel but were herded across the street to the steep Powell Street hill. The demonstration had been loud but peaceful. I'd spent most of the past hour and a half spelling my name for reporters, "Anne with an 'e.' Finger, like it sounds. No, not Singer; what's on the end of your hand," and shouting answers to their questions above the chanting. A friend stopped and joked, "Congratulations on bringing out such a large crowd of cops."

As the demonstration drew to a close, I felt relief that things had been angry but without arrests or scuffles. I was glad, too, that I'd decided to rent the wheelchair. I had polio as a child, and walk with a cane. Usually by the end of a demonstration, I'm exhausted and in pain from being on my feet too long. For the first time in my life, I was finishing a picket without feeling like I needed to go home, take aspirin, and crawl into bed.

About ten to six, we told the police that we were going to march down to Union Square to join the six o'clock rally scheduled there. The cops moved their metal barricades across Sutter Street to block the traffic, and the demonstration moved out. I stayed behind until the last of the crowd had straggled down the hill and then followed them towards Union Square, with my friend Mark pushing my chair.

We were just across the first intersection when I heard the clatter of horses' hooves and the sounds of women screaming.

"Get me down there," I yelled to Mark, and we raced through the crowd like Bloom County's Cutter John, shouting to the tourists "Get out of the way, excuse me, let us through." By the time I reached the end of the block, the crowds were chanting, "The whole world is watching. The whole world is watching."

The events of the next five minutes are jumbled in my memory. I remember going into the street, trying to talk with the cop who seemed to be in charge, trying to find out what was going on and being ordered to get on the sidewalk.

"I'm police liaison," I keep saying, "will you let me talk to—"

"Get on the sidewalk."

A horse is backing up towards me, its hoof a few inches from my face. I am calling one of the police lieutenants by name as he walks past me, "Lieutenant Dachauer, Lieutenant Dachauer," but he doesn't turn his head. A woman I know slightly who writes for The Washington Post says, "I just saw a cop on horseback lose it." A police officer on a horse is moving through the crowd, his baton held high over his head. The crowd starts chanting, "Free the horses, free the horses." I hear that a couple of women have been beaten up, including one of the members of the Peoples' Medics.

It's not until late that evening that I learn my housemate, Lisa Manning, and a close friend of hers, Anne Van Derslice, were two of the women who were most seriously beaten. The next day, Anne is so bruised and sore that she sits on our living room couch and points to her stomach, "I don't hurt here," she says. "I hurt every place else."

She and a friend, Lucrecia Bermudez, had marched with the crowd down Powell Street. They weren't planning to stay for the rally. Instead, they were going to meet a friend and the friend's two-year-old daughter to drive up to Marin and watch the full moon rise. Because the sidewalk was so crowded, they moved across Powell and walked next to a line of parked cars. When they reached the corner of Powell and Post, they started to cut kitty-corner across the intersection, to where they were to meet Kathleen and Rhyan.

Halfway across, they realized that the cops were looking angry and that they were the only people in the street. A cop on a motorcycle told them to get on the sidewalk, and they turned back. He followed them on his red Honda. Anne says, "We were walking around a car that was in the way and the cop drove the motorcycle over my feet. I fell down. He was yelling at me to get up, but I couldn't because he had the motorcycle wheel on my feet." Lucrecia put her foot on the wheel of the motorcycle, trying to get it off Anne's feet. The cop knocked Lucrecia onto the hood of the parked car they had been trying to walk around.

"At that point," Anne says, "I still thought that they were pissed off but that we just needed to get out of the way and it would be cool... And then all these cops just came out and started hitting me..."

Lisa Manning was coming down from the march when she saw Anne being thrown up against the car and beaten. "I pushed people out of my way and ran through the cop lines. I didn't see Lucrecia. I ran right to where Anne was and stood between the cop and Anne. I was trying to push her out of the way." Lisa only remembers being hit on the thigh and the hand, but the videotape of the beating, which we see on TV the next day, shows her being hit repeatedly in the back and on her arms as she holds them in front of her face to fend off the billyclubs.

The tape also clearly shows that both Lisa and Anne were trapped between motorcycles and cars, unable to get away. "There was no sidewalk to get on," Anne said the next day.

"There was nowhere to go."

Meanwhile, when Lucrecia was thrown out to the hood of the car, she reached out her hand to the demonstrators on the sidewalk. "Pull me," she shouted. People reached for her, but before they could grab her, a cop got her and put her in a chokehold. "When he did that thing to me," Lucrecia said, "I didn't want to put any force or resistance, because it would be useless. I lost my body. I just started peeing and peeing and peeing." She was put face down on the street, a cop knelt on her back, pulling her arms up, and handcuffing her.

Naomi Schapiro, a medic, clearly identified by the bright yellow tee-shirt with a large red cross and the words "People's Medic" on both the front and the back, rushed into the street to help Anne and Lisa. She was clubbed from behind, opening up a gash in her head and giving her a concussion.

Then, it was over. Lisa remembers a man with a Lawyer's Guild tee-shirt saying, "I saw all this, I got this guy's badge number. I saw it all. I got the badge number." People from the media surrounded Lisa and Anne, asking them their names and ages. "Do you live here in San Francisco?"

Lucrecia was held for forty minutes outside the van, while the police looked for a camera to photograph her with. Handcuffed, she kept being passed from cop to cop, each one being told, "Here, hold her."

"I never felt so demigrated," she says. "Standing there in the street. I had peed on myself when they put me in the chokehold, and there were tourists there with their cameras, taking pictures." Eventually, she was taken to the Hall of Justice, booked and released. Lucrecia was told that she was being charged with assaulting a police officer and resisting arrest.

Although she gave police her birthplace of Lima, Peru, and told them that she is Latina, her race is listed on police forms as white. "It makes me wonder. Did they not want people to know I was a minority?"

I grew up with scenes of people being beaten: demonstrators scuffling with cops; civil rights marchers in the south; Black people in the city ghettos; anti-war protesters. I'd seen them on the front pages of newspapers and on black and white TV screens; once or twice I'd seen it in front of me. But I wasn't prepared for the emotional aftermath of having it happen so close to home. It wasn't just a political event, a media image—it was also a frightening and enraging episode of physical violence.

The next morning, we did things that seemed like rituals. I went out to buy a roll of film and took pictures of the bruise the nightstick left on Lisa's thigh. Since we didn't have a flash for her Kodak Instamatic, we went out in the backyard, and she pulled down her pants while I knelt down, avoiding blackberry brambles, and shot picture after picture of the ugly purple mark.

The phone kept ringing: "Hello, hero and martyr," one friend says to Lisa. We joke about the way the cops are blaming the Revolutionary Communist Party and the Livermore Action Group—a more unlikely political alliance being hard to imagine. We find ourselves talking about past experiences of violence within families. Lisa cries when she sees Anne and herself being beaten on television. "I'm terrified in crowds," she tells me, "and when I see a cop car..."

Anne comes over. She is so stiff that she has trouble moving. At one point, she is telling me about how the police were hitting her, and she pulls her arm back to show me. The simple motion makes her wince with the pain.

"I keep playing it over in my mind, to try and make it make some sense. In my mind I keep saying, 'I don't understand it. I just don't understand it.' I try to think of it from their side: to reason it out and still think of them as human beings. Of them as being a person confronted with another person. But I can't."

The tape of Lucrecia and Lisa and Anne is played again and again on television. The Today Show, Nightline, the local news. One station runs it in slow motion. Sitting on the edge of my unmade bed on Friday afternoon, I see Anne's face, tears streaming down her cheeks, as she is knocked to the ground, and then rises again. Her mouth forms the words, "Lu, Lu," as she calls to Lucrecia. In slow motion, all their movements are elongated, almost dancelike. Lisa leaps slowly towards Anne and is hit with a billyclub. In slow motion, you see her body reacting to the blow, her hair flying as she drifts back.

I find myself sobbing. In that moment, watching Lisa and Anne being clubbed, I was a child again, facing the physical violence I'd known within my family. A cop in a blue uniform on the screen was beating Lisa; he could have been my father beating me; or any man, beating any woman; or any person with naked power over anyone else. For a moment, reality was seamless. There were only those with raw power, and those without it.

A minute later, the announcer referred to one of the cops as a policewoman. That word, "policewoman," brought me back to the everyday world where things are complex and contradictory, and rarely so direct as a wooden club against flesh.

MOTHERLINES

By CHERYL JONES

Overwhelmed

Penning these lines during lunch break in the corporate jungle. Just haven't seemed to be able to grab the time for writing. More than that, my mind seems devoid of ideas, opinions, even sparks for conversation! Being "in the closet"—Hidden identity, hidden difference, somehow freezing the brain.

Puts me in mind of a few of the basic features of my life as a parent—exhaustion and lack of time. The other day, I quietly came to the door of Caitlin's room (I like to watch her when she doesn't know I'm there) and peered through. Inside, she was running around in circles, saying to herself, "We're in a rush. Have to hurry or we'll be late," madly thrusting things in bags and throwing her dolls in a stroller. Sometimes, we wish children would not help us to see ourselves so clearly!

It's a dilemma, which parts of my life to cut back in the interests of sanity. Most of the mothers I know are incredibly active, politically, and in many, many other ways. Is it because we feel the pressure of other lesbians who believe our children rob "the community" of our energy? Is it because we want to be "good feminists"? Is it because children make us acutely aware of what's wrong in the world, because we want things to be better for them?

I don't know whether it's one of these or all, but last night, as I sat in yet another meeting lending my energies to the resolution of yet another conflict, I suddenly wondered whether I really wanted to be involved at all.

Whether the most important person to me, Caitlin, is paying the price of my commitment. Where is the balance (which I seem to look for and talk about often) in which I respect my relationship with her enough to give her what she needs, have time for myself, have time for my lover, have time for political work, school and, last but not least, making a living. I question whether any kind of balance is possible! What do I give up? What is dispensable? There's a vast difference, I believe between a full life and an overwhelming one!

Then there's the problem of trying to carry on a relationship when you live with a young child. At the odd times when both of us are home, we can't get near each other without the sweet sound of a little voice—"Let's have a family hug—me in the middle." Three year olds know very little about adult privacy. And 9 p.m., after she's asleep, feels like the middle of the night these days.

At my worst moments, I think, how do my friends make it who don't have regular help, who work full-time, parent full-time, live political lives full-time. I think about my day when I take Caitlin to school. Up at 6:30, make the lunch, wake her up, get her dressed, iron my clothes, make my lunch, feed her, dress her, pack extra clothes, take her to school (7:20 and counting) to work by 8. Finish work, stuck in traffic, to childcare by 5:30, pick her up, go home, cook dinner; now it's 7:30, play for awhile, get into pajamas, read a book, listen to "but I'm not tired" for awhile so we lie down together; now it's 8:45, I drift off with her and the day is over. Phew! And many women do that every single day. Some days, Marie does it, or I think I might really go bananas (What I am now is only half bananas).

I couldn't really comprehend the time a child would take before Caitlin was born. And that leads me to something else I've thought a lot about lately: the child-centered life.

At what point did the focus for me turn away from adult activities and towards fun for Caitlin? Perhaps in self-defense, my best times have become the times I can really give myself over to a "children's" activity. Weekends at Lake Temescal, Children's Fairyland, the Muppet Movies, watching Sesame Street together—that's how I spend my free time now. What's more, I really have fun doing those things.

A friend once said she believes there are two "communities"—child-oriented lesbians and non-child-oriented lesbians. We have different lifestyles, get up and go to bed at different times, do different things for fun. We can sometimes meet for brunch, but even at that, the kids have eaten twice by then and we have to squeeze it in before naptime!

As children get older, they demand less, allow us to participate in both communities, one might say to "pass". But I find myself ever more gravitating to other lesbians involved with children for my support, friendship and social community. We share assumptions about life, implicit understandings. Even the other mothers at my temp job have an understanding of the reality of my life that other women would not have. That's a strange feeling—to have something in common with women I never would have known before.

After all is said and resaid, I find it incredible that we as mothers accomplish what we do, that we communicate with each other, that we are a very active, if sometimes invisible, political force, and that most of us would not trade our lives for any other. Because, although it may not always look like it, there are compensations to match the pitfalls. And, now that I've cheered myself up, it's time to go back to work.

Before I go, a few words:

I want to write a column expressing our different family styles, and I'd like to hear from my readers who have children just how your families work. We are a diverse and interesting force in family life, and I want to reflect that here. Please write and let me know how you are raising your children. Also tell me what works, doesn't work, needs help, etc. Be sure to brag about yourselves! Thanks for the help.

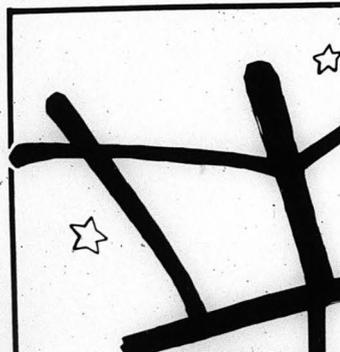

I'm also trying to compile a list of services for lesbian families. So far, it's an informal project, but I might want to make a little directory eventually. So, if you have a service that you feel is especially appropriate for use by lesbian families, please let me know. If the connection isn't obvious, write me a note about that, too. Do you counsel lesbian families, offer childcare, offer legal guardianship services? Use your imagination.

Don't forget to keep writing!

Letter from Portugal

BY CRAIG MACHADO

The travel industry bills Portugal as the "Gateway to Europe," while the Portuguese are fond of calling their homeland a garden on the Atlantic. The garden metaphor grows on you as you spend time in a country with terraced plots clinging to hillsides, groves of olive trees, vineyards just about everywhere, flowers blooming, palms gently waving. The capital, Lisbon, shares a lot of things with San Francisco, including a coastal climate, trolley cars, hills, beaches—though the Atlantic offers the bather a more inviting swim than our frigid Pacific.

Prior to the "Revolution of Carnations," which ushered in Portugal's first parliamentary democracy in 1974, the country had languished under several decades of dictator Salazar's paternal hand. The most striking reminders of the country's political evolution can be seen on walls and public buildings everywhere—from the tiniest village to the bustling cities—adherents to various political parties have drawn, painted, plastered and scrawled political graffiti, slogans, posters. The most pervasive slogan to be seen these days and one attributed frequently to the anarchists is "Governo a Rua," which translates into "Down with the government." The political sloganeering reflects the tumultuous process in which Portugal finds itself as it searches for a successful and stable means of steering clear of staggering unemployment (as high as 30% in some sectors), massive foreign indebtedness (primarily to the U.S.), illiteracy (still reckoned to be around 25%) and an unfavorable balance of trade.

Interested as I was with the country's future and its past (my grandfather was born in the Azores Islands), I harbored a special curiosity for gay life there. What with the excitement of the revolution of '74 still glowing, would I find a flourishing gay community(ies)? Did even such a thing as a gay rights movement exist? Surely a feminist movement had grown and perhaps nurtured an interest in lesbians and gays? Soon after arriving in Portugal, through a chance meeting I made the acquaintance of a delightful gay man, a philosophy student, linguist and writer who would serve as my personal guide, showing me a Portugal about as far away as one could get from Polyester-

Political posters serve as reminders of Portugal's recent revolution.

America-On-Tour-With-Name-Tags-And-Movie-Cameras-Equipped-With-Portable-Microphones. Victor would help to illuminate my gross naivete about gay life in Portugal; the two of us were to share intensely for two weeks each other's culture and social milieu and cement a lasting friendship.

Really, to contemplate gay life in Portugal, to understand the role of women and to this day their second-class status, to know anything of Portugal, one has to look at the Catholic Church. In Portugal the Church is experienced again and again through its magnificent cathedrals, monasteries, its world-famous pilgrimages to places like Fatima, its innumerable feasting days in honor of a plethora of saints, its aged women who are to be seen frequently shrouded in black, mourning a loved one or huddled together in mass, mumbling prayers and clutching at rosary beads. Politically, the Church sits center/right, its latest battle being waged against the Socialist government's abortion law. (The law now permits abortion but under the most stringent of conditions. People I spoke with said it was still considered horribly shameful to even consider an abortion.) Victor, himself raised Catholic but since grown away from it, was quick to point out that homosexuality is strictly taboo and condemnable, and it is doubtful whether or not discussions of a homosexual's civil/human rights is ever entertained.

Women don't fare too terribly well either, given the Church's influence over Portuguese life, the centuries of male hierarchical clerical rule, the status of woman as humble servant. The status of women was brought home rather clearly to me during my stay at Victor's University Residence, a dorm-style living arrangement shared by twelve men. Every day a woman came in to make the students' beds, clean their bathrooms (imagine one bathroom for twelve men) and kitchen area, which was filthy and cluttered with the aftermath of preparing meals. Victor told me that he, too, was dismayed by this and had suggested to the others, more than once, that they might try picking up a bit more after one another. He was promptly chided for wanting to usurp the cleaning woman's role! In other Portuguese homes I visited, even those with women working outside the home, the women were still expected to cook, clean, shop and care for the children.

During the course of my visit, Victor and I shared a lot about what living gay means. He was continually amazed to hear about gay life in the States, the numerous activities and organizations which have flourished for and by gays, the right, at least in larger urban areas, to freely associate with one another. In Coimbra, Portugal's third largest city and seat of the oldest established university in Europe (1290), the only kind of association known to gays, according to Victor, is a public park. Apparently the fear of disclosure is such that people who have met and been intimate with each other rarely pursue the liaison. Even people who have known each other for longer periods do not, as a rule, acknowledge each other on the streets or in public places. Victor pointed several people out to me through the course of our many city walks who he knows to be gay, yet they dared not greet us. What struck me as particularly painful for Victor, a philosophy student, a lover of ideas, conversation, and dialog, was the realization that nowhere on a campus of 15,000 students was there an organization, a club, a regular meeting place for gays to come and talk. Famous homosexuals in history—painters, writers, musicians, philosophers are identified in classes, says Victor, yet their condition is viewed as a permissible aberration; i.e., artists are odd, eccentric, and are forgiven their abnormalities.

Victor had insisted that upon our return to Lisbon we visit a gay bar, because he had never been to one. He told me he had read of "these places" recently in a newspaper article which purported to give the inside view of gay life in Lisbon. The article, Victor warned, was mostly of a sensational nature, focusing on the exotic Brazilian drag queens and their stage shows. The bar we picked could have been in any large city—Paris, London, New York, San Francisco. The clothes, hairstyles and poses reminded me of what has come to be known as the "international gay look." For Victor, who had known nothing but furtive encounters and what he'd read in books, the bar was an overwhelming experience; gay people together, touching, laughing, dancing, kissing. He spent a good two hours drinking in what were for him totally new visual, tactile and emotional experiences. Later, he confided to me that he had never imagined what gay people did socially, how they interacted or the attention they gave to personal appearance and attractiveness. He said to me, "And I've felt so alone with my thoughts about being gay, really I believed until tonight that gay people were probably all ugly or wore dark clothes to hide themselves." That night was a major step for Victor, a step out of hiding, isolation and fear.

Portugal still has a long way to go in bringing gay people into national consciousness. The political revolution of '74 has yet to take into account seriously and consistently the concerns of women and gays. Aside from bars and private clubs in the largest cities, Oporto and Lisbon, the kind of social and cultural gay infrastructure begun elsewhere in Western Europe and the States waits to be created. A repressive church and a machismo Portuguese style still operate forcefully here. Yet I know at least one young Portuguese man with a lot of spirit and intellect whose head is buzzing with possibilities—a gay students' coffee circle, a gay philosophy club, a paper, a conference. It's going to be a struggle, but I'm convinced that with people like Victor, gay life in the "Atlantic Garden" is about to be cultivated in earnest.

THE STATE OF THE SCIENCE

By MICHAEL HELQUIST

Questions Arise on AIDS Test

Now it's become recent history: the much-heralded news conference in late April during which Margaret Heckler, Secretary of Health and Human Services, stated, "A blood test for AIDS will become available within the next six months." That was three months ago, and, indeed, there are reports since then of progress in developing such a test.

The major questions posed by the imminent availability of a test for AIDS are, "Should a gay man participate in the testing?" and, "What will a positive test result mean?" Two medical doctors active in AIDS research and patient care recently addressed these questions. Dennis McShane, M.D., is an Assistant Clinical Professor of Medicine at Stanford University. McShane was also recently chosen to be president-elect of Bay Area Physicians for Human Rights (BAPHR). Neil R. Schram, M.D., serves as the Chair of the Medical Advisory Council AIDS Project/Los Angeles.

McShane delivered an address at the recent annual BAPHR symposium held in San Francisco. He first considered the dilemmas to be faced by the doctors of men who get a positive result from an AIDS screening test. "Consider the following two scenarios: a bisexual male goes to the Red Cross to donate blood. The unit is screened for antibody to AIDS antigens and the result is positive. The donor is entirely asymptomatic, married and the father of 3 children, and makes gay sexual liaisons at the baths and bookstores. You, as his physician are contacted in a panic by the patient after he has been told by the blood bank that his AIDS test was positive. What do you advise him?" McShane then offered a second example. "You have a patient in your practice who has a stable generalized lymphadenopathy [swollen lymph glands] of uncertain etiology [origin], a helper/suppressor cell ratio of 0.7 with normal of 1 to 1.5, but who is otherwise asymptomatic. You send a sample of blood for AIDS screening at his request and [because of] your curiosity, and it turns out positive. What do you now advise your patient?"

McShane believes that doctors will all have to confront the issue of what to tell the individual with a positive AIDS test. He calls for more research, not only for the development of the AIDS test but also to provide information about the nature of the AIDS viral agent. He suggests that some viral antigens may correlate with communicability while others may countermand this approach." McShane concludes that the very likely possibility of a high incidence of positive results to AIDS screening among gay men in the Bay Area presents health planning with "staggering" implications.

Neil Schram, M.D., recently compiled a very concise synopsis of issues related to the probable AIDS agent, called HTLV-3 (Human T-cell Lymphotropic Virus) or LAV (Lymphadenopathy Associated Virus) depending on your preference for researchers on either side of the Atlantic. What does Dr. Schram think the blood test for HTLV-3 means? "A positive test apparently means infection at some time with the virus. There is no information yet about how many people who become infected with the virus will develop AIDS. Nor is it known when or how someone infected with the virus is infectious through sexual contact or blood donation. However, for purposes of blood donation, anyone with a positive test will be considered an unsafe blood donor." Schram believes that some gay men may want to have a blood test due to a willingness to participate in scientific studies and/or to a strong desire to continue with your precautions so you don't infect others and so you don't get other diseases that MIGHT increase your chances of developing AIDS; and, if negative, continue with the same precautions so you don't become infected.

Both McShane and Schram express concern about the issue of confidentiality. McShane observes that conflicts between the individual's right to privacy and society's need for protection will continue to flare during the course of this epidemic. He calls for strengthening safeguards to ensure that information obtained in AIDS research—and from the AIDS test in particular—is not released in any manner which may compromise an individual's confidentiality. McShane observes, "This is of particular importance since various behaviors being investigated are still considered illicit and illegal in many regions of the country."

Schram further cautions that once the AIDS test is widely available, "a positive test could be used to exclude people from certain professions [e.g. health care workers], could prevent people from getting health or life insurance, and possibly have other ramifications as well." Schram advises people to consider carefully whether or not the imminent AIDS test will offer any personal benefits. He further states, "I strongly advise people not to be tested unless confidentiality is guaranteed and these other potential problems are addressed."

However encouraging the news of the probable discovery of the AIDS agent was last April, it has become evident that the discovery poses as many potential problems as it offers possible solutions. And it clearly does not solve the AIDS problem. McShane concluded his comments with the observation that "I do not foresee a quick fix to AIDS but rather a slow, careful progress towards its understanding." Neil Schram offers what seems the only reasonable conclusion. He remarks, "We must recognize that AIDS will be with us for years, and we must continue to do what we are doing—protecting ourselves as best we can, volunteering to help people with AIDS, and continuing to push for more funds for research and education."

"People with a positive test will have to live with the fact that they COULD develop AIDS at some time in their lives and they may be infectious to their sexual partners."

represent an asymptomatic carrier state (which might indicate that the infection has been "resolved"), while still others may well correlate with the future development of AIDS. Without this information, he declares, "We will be confronted once again with mass hysteria." He adds, "We need to call for careful study in a research setting, to answer the above questions before we embark on mass screening. Unfortunately, political pressures may know the results. He comments, "People with a positive test will have to live with the fact that they COULD develop AIDS at some time in their lives and they may be infectious to their sexual partners." When you think about it, of course, that's the very same situation that a great majority of gay men live with right now—without the benefit of any test results. Schram's advice is the same whether a test result is positive or negative: if positive, con-

HERSTORICAL WANDERGROUND

By LYNN FONFA

In our diverse lesbian community there is one thing we all understand: the importance of community action and organizing conferences. As individuals and in groups, we continue to fight for social and political change. We all know that it's not always easy. Reinventing the wheel is an old cliché, especially when you talk about political action in the lesbian community. Each group tries to figure out how to begin, which mistakes to avoid and what right moves to make.

How do we try to avoid these mistakes? We talk with women who have done political organizing, because it's important to get the perspective of as many individuals as possible. But what about the papers, flyers or "manifestos" of past organizations? These papers are going to tell us a lot too: who these lesbians were, to whom they addressed themselves, and what they felt was the critical issue. This is important stuff.

Now think about this: a lesbian archives that collects these organizational papers and as many articles about the groups as possible. That's what the West Coast Lesbian Collections is all about: finding out both the political and personal relationships of lesbians to each other and to the society in which we live.

Before telling you about some of the organizational papers at the WCLC, let me remind you that these papers are in an archives because women like you saved them, knowing that they were important, for their own story and for the story of our community. The Collections asks you to make the next move in making certain that you and your work are known and remembered.

Only you can make a lesbian archives!

Lesbian Schoolworkers. With a commitment to "fighting racism, sexism, class and oppression within our own movement and this society," the Lesbian Schoolworkers organized in 1977 to defeat the Briggs Initiative. Their records consist of an organizational history, principles of unity and structure, press releases, leaflets, newsletters, photographs, newspaper clippings, campaign posters, the Schoolworker banner and buttons.

The organization was among the many to rally against the anti-lesbian and gay bill, but it was among the few which actively campaigned against both the anti-lesbian and pro-death penalty laws, continually pointing out the relationship between Third World oppression and the oppression of all lesbians. The Schoolworkers are probably best known for their slideshow, "Don't Let It Happen Here." Designed to inform people of the dangers of the Briggs Initiative, it drew together such crucial struggles as the Bakke case, abortion, the death penalty, and women's and lesbians' oppression. Amber Hollibaugh, political activist, traveled through small Northern-California towns presenting the slideshow, participating in public debates with virulent opposition leaders. Throughout the election fight, the Schoolworkers emphasized that the struggle against the proposition was not a single campaign issue or just a fight for civil rights but was "to make it clear to people that we are all suffering at the hands of a common enemy."

National Lesbian Feminist Organization. Alice Paul Chapter, Los Angeles. 1978-1979. The NLFO was founded in 1978 as a grass roots organization in order to "act on a feminist platform which deals with the oppression of lesbians in all its manifestations..." The records consist of an organizational history, founding convention notes, correspondence, committee memos and newsletters, and notes on disagreements over the credibility of "representative organizations."

Also in the NLFO papers is the Lesbians of Color Caucus Statement: "...as the Convention began it became apparent that, as usual, lesbians of color were under-represented. Lesbians of color who were observers were appointed as delegates by vote of the convention. Our numbers were approximately 15 out of about 150 delegates. However, the Lesbians of Color were very visible and outspoken at the conference, and played an important part in the proceedings. The first resolution which was passed, and the only one which will not be reconsidered at the national ratifying convention in June of 1979, was the Lesbians of Color resolution, which states: that henceforward lesbians of color will hold a 50% vote on all policy and decision making within the organization, regardless of the number of lesbians of color present.—And it's about time!...We hope that lesbians of color will begin to form affinity groups and that we will keep in contact with one another. Lesbians of color groups can be made up of lesbians of all colors or lesbians of a particular color, it doesn't matter as long as we can be in communication and support each other. We recognize that lesbians of color come from many different spaces and so we do not try to encourage one line of thinking. We come together to fight our oppression as women of color and as lesbians. And we come together to validate and support one another's personal and political struggles."

Jewish Feminist Conference. (1982) "Statement of Purpose—Why is this conference different from all other conferences? This conference is being organized by Jewish lesbians and feminists...For many of us the dynamic of being Jewish and lesbian has fueled our energy and provided the impetus for our work." This collection includes the program, committee notes and minutes, photographs, publicity announcements, flyers and audio tapes from the workshops. The conference packet contains statements on such topics as anti-Semitism, racism, ageism, class and fat oppression, disability oppression and differing cultures within Judaism.

Fat Liberation Manifesto. In 1972-1973, the Fat Underground first organized in Venice, California to actively challenge people's assumptions about fat and confront the issue of "looksism." This group published many flyers and information sheets about the diet industry and medical profession; picketed television stations which sponsored "diet week" on their talk shows; and held numerous workshops on the politics of fat.

Since then various groups have emerged to confront fat oppression. "Fat Chance" and "Fat Lip Readers' Theatre" are among the groups who have performed in the Bay Area, and Life in the Fat Lane sponsors fat women's swims. Bay Area writers contributed to Shadow on a Tightrope, the anthology about being fat and fat politics.

This 1973 Fat Liberation Manifesto, written by Judy Freespirit and Aldebaran, started it all. Here are excerpts from 7 main points: 1. We believe that fat people are fully entitled to human respect and recognition. 2. We are angry at mistreatment by commercial and sexist interests. These have exploited our bodies as objects of ridicule, thereby creating an immensely profitable market selling the false promise of avoidance of, or relief from, that ridicule. 3. We see our struggle as allied with the struggles of other oppressed groups against classism, racism, sexism, ageism, financial exploitation, imperialism and the like. 4. We demand equal rights for fat people in all aspects of life...access to goods and services in the public domain, and an end to discrimination against us in the areas of employment, education, public facilities and health services. 5. We single out as our special enemies the so-called "reducing industries." We demand that they take responsibility for their false claims, acknowledge that their products are harmful to the public health, and publish long-term studies proving any statistical efficacy of their products. 6. We repudiate the mystified "science" which falsely claims that we are unfit... 7. We refuse to be subjugated to the interests of our enemies. We fully intend to reclaim power over our bodies and our lives. We commit ourselves to pursue these goals together. FAT PEOPLE OF THE WORLD UNITE! YOU HAVE NOTHING TO LOSE...

basked in the warmth of her touch. I felt nurtured and healed by the presence of this person who did not know what I was going through in those two days, but who supported and encouraged my efforts. The echo that kept screaming HOMOSEXUAL at me over and over again the first day faded into quieter regions of my mind as I fell to sleep.

I felt betrayed by the L.A.G. action. I did not feel their display represented my experience as a lesbian. I did not understand their intention with this kind of confrontational exposition.

The L.A.G. demonstration was a fragmented presentation, defining lesbianism as a sexual identification and nothing more. As gays and lesbians, we wear our sexual identification on our shirtsleeves. Sex, which for most heterosexual individuals is a private matter, becomes a primary indicator of who and how we are. Regardless of how stable or multi-dimensional our relationships are, we are still defined by the sex that we have.

For the Moral Majority, homosexuality is definitely a sexual definition and no other. It is sex outside the God-consecrated family and therefore promiscuous and therefore "deleterious to human society." The L.A.G. demonstration isolated lesbianism to the sex that two women might have. The women kissing at Nat Hentoff's talk confirmed everything that their audience suspected of them. The Livermore Action Group's understanding of lesbianism might be assumed to be as limited as that of the Moral Majority.

I leave the Moral Majority's gathering in San Francisco feeling deeply concerned about the values of this organization and others like it. I am especially concerned because the New Right, if the Family Forum is any indica-members of this movement become more extroverted and involved in politics, they are making stronger appeal to "middle America" with language that is not so much hell and damnation, but more good-old American common sense. I do not believe the content is different, merely the delivery. Good-old American marketing techniques.

Looking around at that group of people, who looked so much like my past, I was struck also by their vulnerability. The Moral Majority is not wholly other to me. I know who these people are and where they come from. The bulk of them would much rather stay home, safe and sound, and not be out saving anyone else's world, or even know about it. They are not staying home, however, and the power that they may exert is to be reckoned with.

I continue to believe that the best, most positive influence we can have will be in relationships with the people around us—especially those who are most different from ourselves. Being at the Family Forum and talking to lots of people since then, both friends and strangers, has reminded me of the power of human contact. Two days with the Moral Majority strengthened and affirmed my own values and preferences. In a way, I am even excited that the Moral Majority leadership is encouraging its members to "come out" and speak up in their communities for what they believe in. One of the most traditional of traditional values may be a complacent passiveness and unwillingness to create conflict. If the New Right succeeds in jarring its supporters out of their phlegmatic state, neither the Right nor the rest of us will be the same again. "Coming out," as we have been telling them all along, is a challenge to everyone.

The Moral Majority is also becoming very wise about its own image. The language on all issues is much milder than I had expected. For example, "We look upon homosexuality as we do upon all sinners... but God loves sinners." At no time did they suggest that the civil rights of any individual who might fall into the category of "sinner" should be violated. As the

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By JACK FERTIG

This month there is a total lack of aspects or transits by which I could give an accurate forecast. After all, I'm not Jean Dixon; I've got standards! So instead of Sun signs, let's take a look at the planet of luck, and of standards, Saturn.

For thousands of years, until quite recently, Saturn was nicknamed "The Grand Malefic." Now Jerry Falwell has usurped that title, but for more basic reasons we understand that there is a positive side of Saturn.

In the birth chart, Saturn shows what you have trouble with, how you feel restricted in your life, and matters in which you never feel quite good enough. Some people, alas, resign themselves to hopelessness, and indeed continue to have trouble with Saturn throughout their lives. You can, however, work through Saturn's influence and use it as the planet of ambition and accomplishment. Where you feel not quite good you can get better. You may feel inadequate still and work to become better. You may become the best there is and still feel a need to improve. In earlier, more stratified eras, there was less opportunity to improve as one wanted. Wherever you had Saturn you were stuck.

Saturn shows how you achieve authority and how you deal with the authority of others. A medieval serf or a Victorian era laborer in confrontation with authority was strictly S.O.L. These days such a challenge could still be bad news, but there may also be the opportunity to prove oneself and achieve new heights.

Understanding the role of Saturn in your birth chart can help you to overcome the obstacles in your life and turn them into building blocks towards accomplishment.

The following list shows the dates that Saturn moved from one sign to another in this century. Find the date most nearly previous to your birthdate. The sign listed next to that date is your Saturn Sign.

The following paragraphs are not predictions for the month, but part of your character as described in your birth chart. Remember that our Saturn Sign, like your Sun sign, is only one part of your entire personality.

Saturn in Aries: You have a strong sense of duty and great will power, but need to work at developing confidence and a strong sense of identity. Your need to prove yourself tends to pre-empt the faith in yourself necessary to achieve your goals, making you cranky and inhibiting your ability to deal with frustration and conflict.

Saturn in Taurus: Your need for financial security and stability can make you hoarding and inflexible. Regarding others as unreliable, you tend to over-compensate. You are sharper at fiscal management than you give yourself credit for. Try to relax and enjoy those skills to gain the most from them.

Saturn in Gemini: Your shrewd, calculating mind is well applied to math and science, but you have trouble achieving intellectual confidence and tend to be a dilettante. Words do not come easily to you, but with some work you can always find the best phrases. For practice set aside some time to write your thoughts in a private journal.

Saturn in Cancer: Emotional contact is difficult for you, so you try to compensate by building relationships around work and business, feeling that love must be earned and proven. Underneath it all, you have tremendous integrity to your feelings, which you protect by shutting others out. Love comes only with great difficulty, but once achieved it is permanent.

Saturn in Leo: You crave attention, but dread being put in a spotlight of somebody else's choosing. You want others to recognize your talents, but have trouble enjoying them yourself. If you overcome your natural reticence and learn to project confidence, you could do well as a professional entertainer.

Saturn in Virgo: You can get hung up all too easily on insignificant details. It seems that nobody ever does a good enough job, but you resent having to clean up after their "mistakes." Concentrate on doing the best job you can and realize that perfection is only an ideal that should be constantly strived for, although it is never achieved. Develop a sense of humor to cope with human fallibility.

Saturn in Libra: You work hard at being sweet and charming in order to hide your tight, conservative standards of behavior. You guard yourself carefully against the opinions of others and need to have relationships carefully spelled out through contracts. Insistence on high standards in relationships can leave you in solitude. Learn to enjoy your natural bitchiness, and use it as game for others to enjoy as well.

Saturn in Scorpio: You have a strong sense of the presence of death and sexuality, two facets of life that are at some level omnipresent, but difficult to deal with. For you these issues are especially problematic. You could easily fall into morbid patterns and/or sexual hang-ups. But the inherent need to deal with such issues can also be tremendously productive and positive. Confrontations with death and eros can lead you to profound understandings and wisdom far beyond most people.

Saturn in Sagittarius: You strive to develop a far-reaching, open mind, but you really can be dogmatic and/or traditionalist in your philosophy. You crave and pursue freedom, feeling that it must be achieved or earned. Realize that freedom comes from within and need only be exercised, and your tenacious, hard-working mind will go as far as you wish.

Saturn in Capricorn: You strive to develop discipline and a strong sense of personal authority and accomplishment, even though you already have these traits far more than other mere mortals. Try to acknowledge and enjoy the strength you already possess or you may be stuck grimly pursuing that which you don't need.

Saturn in Aquarius: You fit the classic definition of a humanitarian as one who loves humanity but doesn't get along with people. Your high ideals for others may not take their own desires into account and you're then left wondering why your efforts on their behalf are unappreciated. Although you really do know best, remember your democratic ideals and try to give others equal say.

Saturn in Pisces: You strive to develop and demonstrate faith through material acts of self-sacrifice. It is hard to understand that true faith exists in and of itself without material proofs. Your acts of sacrifice are often neither necessary nor asked for, yet you wonder why they achieve so little. Try to find acts of compassion and love which elevate you personally through joy and avoid the self-degradation that passes for martyrdom.

CABARET GO-ROUND

BY GENE PRICE

Elizabeth Bice, Eric Morris

Some things, thank God, never change, and made-for-each-other Ruth Hastings and "Jacques Brel is Alive and Well and Living in Paris" is a fine example.

Ms. Hastings and co-stars Craig Jessup and Doug Trantham have moved into the 132 Club for a weekend schedule extending through August. The show is just as you remembered it from its 1977 debut and 18-month run at Chez Jacques.

Hastings, in a sleek new hairdo (August of Shylocks), set the evening's pace with her opening "Marathon" and then moved at a brisk pace through 26 haunting, hard-driving Brel melodies. Jessup sang lead on "Madeleine," soloed on "Mathilde," and impressed the assembly with the force of his interpretation. Vocally and dramatically, he shows major growth since he first interpreted the Brel songs. He did an especially fine reading of the bitter, ironic "The Statue."

Hastings was most poignant on "Timid Frieda," and her "Old Folks" with its musty images, was touching and, as always, memorable. Vocally, she is most moving on this latter number, although she is also superb on the up-tempo melody of "Sons of..." "Girls and Dogs" and "Brussels" served well as duets, but it was for such moments as Hastings' powerhouse "Amsterdam" and the fondly remembered "No, Love, You're Not Alone" that the audience lavished its applause. "Carousel" and, of course, "If We Only Have Love" (the Hastings anthem) closed the show. A mesmerizing performance. Yes, Virginia, history does repeat itself!

"Jacques Brel..." plays Thurs., Fri., and Sat. at 8:30 at 13 Bush.

After a successful run in Walnut Creek, producer Adrianna Lavell's Magic Moments from Starting Here, Starting Now bowed at the Plush Room early in July. The Richard Maltby, Jr./David Shire collaboration featured the talents of Alan Cameron, Peggy Huff and Stephanie McClain, three attractive interpreters of some delightfully urbane lyrics.

The bright, sassy revue features 22 songs, most of which deal with the pitfalls of falling in, staying in, or falling out of love. Some of them, such as that bitterest of love/hate songs, "I Don't Remember Christmas" (impressively interpreted by Alan) and the big, torchy ballad "What About Today" (sung by Peggy), became cabaret standards following the show's 1977 off-Broadway opening.

After a somewhat bland opening number, Alan came alive in his duet with Stephanie, "I'm a Little Bit Off," and in his satirical solo, "We Can Talk to Each Other." Peggy's

"Crossword Puzzle" was sung with wit and style although her second "specialty" number, "I'm Going to Make You Beautiful," was not as funny as I remembered from the original cast tour.

Stephanie's lovely soprano was left to interpreting some of the less interesting songs. She did what she could with "Autumn," but it's still boring, repetitious, second-rate Cole Porter. This charming redhead was at her best in ensemble numbers, and let's hope we see more of her as a solo on the cabaret scene.

The numbers I liked best were the "company" songs: "Beautiful," "I Don't Believe It," and "Pleased with Myself." But the hit of the show was that irresistible soft shoe "One Step," with Alan's show-biz rendition of "Flair" coming in a close second.

Obviously, 22 numbers can't all be first-rate. Some judicious cutting (such as the forgettable "Barbara") would have moved the show at a brisker clip. Carol Hovey directed, and

"Bobby and I"

Elizabeth Wood created some effective choreography within the confines of those two grand pianos on stage.

"Hissy Fits" has hit the Valencia Rose and there's no known cure. Just see it and enjoy.

"Hissy Fits" is a comedy revue written and performed by Tom Ammanno, Suzy Berger, M. Brauer, Ellen Brook Davis, and Doug Holsclaw. As in any revue, some skits are better than others, and some are hilarious.

Topics range from tourists at Fisherman's Wharf (Suzy is an absolute gem), to feminine products, to palimony cases. Doug and Tom are especially funny as two fag models trying to butch it up for a beer commercial. Suzy, Ellen and M. Brauer set up a frantic cruising bit in a women's bar, and later the same three do a marvelous take-off of a recent theater piece in "Last Week at Half Moon Bay." "Mirage A Trois" features Tom, Suzy and Doug in a bitchy/funny send-up a la Noel Coward.

Twelve blackout skits in all. The revue is still being polished, and possibly new numbers will be added. A good opportunity to see some of our best comedians working in tandem. "Hissy Fits" repeats on Fridays at 10:30, Aug. 17, 24, and 31 at the Valencia Rose. Be there!

Ms. Berger, a creature of considerable whimsy, did last month's comedy nights at the Baybrick Inn. She is an original. Her face, in repose, looks like a Renaissance angel, making it difficult to believe her description of herself as a "macho" person. Both her father and her mother were "macho," she tells us. Her mother, a former roller derby queen, used to "hip check" little Suzy against the stove—just to keep in practice. Suzy, the woman, is a master of understatement. Informed by a billboard that "Happiness is Coming," she remarks simply, "I already knew that."

Once upon a time—in what now passes for the good 'ole days in San Francisco—a young couple worked up some songs and patter and opened their act at a small North Beach club. They were very good and so they attracted many fans, some excellent reviews, and a recording contract. They sang at jazz festivals, on several major television shows, and at such legendary clubs as the Hungry 1, El Matador, and the Boarding House, as well as at the Fairmont Hotel.

Then along the way, Bobby Burch and Ken Fishler married and produced three children. Happy ending.

Now, to bring you up to date, "Bobby and I" are back. I caught one set at the 132 Club last week and am delighted to report that these musicians are in top form. Bobby sings up front and Ken backs her up on keyboard and vocals, and from the moment she begins caressing the lyrics of "Lover Come Back" you know you're in for a rare treat. It was the best of late night music at the cocktail hour.

Their fine and mellow program ranged from Christopher Cross' "If You Get-Caught Between the Moon and New York City" to the Latin rhythms of Peter Allen's "Rio" and a jazzy laid-back "It Might as Well be Spring." A Rogers and Hart medley featured the lovely "Wait Till You See Her," "Bewitched, Bothered and Bewildered," and some razzmatazz scatting on "Mountain Greenery," "Small Fry," a serendipitous gem from the forties, was given its respectful due.

"Bobby and I" are top drawer talent at its finest. They'll dazzle you with their purity of phrasing. They have respect for their material and their joy in their work is infectious.

"Bobby and I" sing again at the 132 Club on Thursdays, Aug. 2 and 23. Miss them at your own peril.

Celebrating thirty years of entertaining in San Francisco, Michelle played to packed houses at Sutter's Mill Cabaret. A prima raconteur, she is a star in the grand manner. Michelle's forte is total recall; his method is stream-of-consciousness gossip; his gown, forty-seven yards of cerise taffeta. (Balenciaga would have stabbed himself.) He reminisced about the "good old days" when appearing in public in drag was an open invitation to a free ride in the Black Maria and a night in the slammer.

As his audience of fans and old friends would call out requests for favorite stories, he would oblige with another trip down memory lane. Some of his escapades may not have been so funny then, but they're hilarious now. He recounted such jail-induced traumas as how to loosen the stays of his corset without actually taking off the dress in front of his incredulous cellmates...or how to sleep upright on a cell bunk so as not to muss his wig prior to the next morning's court appearance.

This arbiter of drag fashion changed gowns (in and out of a prom dress and into an elegant black number dripping with pearls), fluffing and zipping as he continued his monologue.

One of my favorites was his outrageous tale of flying to L.A. on a PSA with a wig box. Resisting the stewardess' efforts to put the dressed wig in the luggage compartment, he was finally forced to purchase a ticket for it. Once a seat-holding passenger, the wig constantly buzzed the stewardess for necessities such as magazines, pillows and more martinis. The wig adored the flight; the stewardess was destroyed.

He also reprised his story of riding to work seated outside on a cable car. As the car stopped for a gaggle of boarding tourists, he would open his brown bag lunch, take out his white bread sandwich, open it like a compact, remove a slice of baloney, and powder his nose.

"I'm really two people. I can lock her in the closet but she pounds on the door and starts screaming, 'It's a pretty day, and if I don't get out my dress will rot!'"

Michelle...thirty years of local gay history told with wit and warmth. His standing ovation was well deserved. Now living in upstate New York, where he is restoring his house, he promises to return in another musical. Soon, we hope.

Madeline, another fresh face on the local scene, reprised her "More of Me" act at the 132 Club. She's a warm performer with a winning smile and a gift for repartee that leads logically from one song to another. It was an eclectic and somewhat nostalgic program. When did you last hear "Who's Afraid of the Big Bad Wolf?"

Ruth Hastings

Between comedic monologues she sang such ballads as "Autumn Nocturn," "My Father," and the touching but funny "Frank Mills." Much to her credit, she sang "Mad About the Boy" in a straightforward manner. (One more camp version of that ditty would have done me in.) The upbeat "Murder, He Says," was a welcome resurrection from the past, as was Cole Porter's "Take Me Back to Manhattan." She delivered the various verses of "Don't Put Your Daughter on the Stage, Mrs. Worthington" in various accents, then moved into such big ballads as "Out Here on My Own" and "I Believe."

Madeline was joined by actor/singer Joe Rodriguez in the acting/singing duet "Talking to Yourself" from Subways are for Sleeping. She rounded out the set with the inevitable "Memory" coupled with the Sondheim sleeper that's creeping into everyone's repertoire, "I Remember Sky." One of today's most potent ballads, "Never Say Goodbye," revealed the full, rich quality of her voice to its best advantage.

She was accompanied by John Tuttle. Marc Anthony directed.

Madeline is currently performing—along with a number of other cabaret performers—in the Bahamian musical You Can Lead A Horse to Water at the Julian Theatre, Wednesdays through Sundays.

Madeline

Wendy Cooper and Tom Ammiano shared 132 Club billing recently for an early evening of off-the-wall comedy and cool jazz. Tom's star is taking off. In the past six months, he's played the major cabarets, comedy clubs, the River, KQAK radio, and he may show up on TV's "Comedy at the Improv" at any time. Tom sets up a situation and then tosses one-liners into the audience like a string of firecrackers. He's hot.

Jazz stylist Wendy Cooper has made considerable progress as a club vocalist since I first saw her a few months ago. Her stage presence is more confident and her voice, warm with a hint of huskiness, is more assured. She opened with a fine rendition of "I'm Beginning to See the Light" and followed with a couple of standards, "Don't Get Around Much Anymore" and Billie Holiday's "God Bless the Child." I liked best Cooper's relaxed, swinging treatment of the Andrew Sisters' oldie, "Get Your Kicks on Route Sixty-Six." Nice arrangement, and good to hear it again. When it comes to jazz, you can't dissociate the voice from the instruments, and we hereby pay homage to Cooper's very talented musicians. Andrea Haverback on keyboards and Neil Heidler on bass were no less than superb.

Eugene Barry-Hill and Jacquii Marshall recently debuted at the Plush Room as duo/solo vocalists in a rhythm and blues evening called "Friends in Love."

Both performers have extensive local credits, and Barry-Hill, whom I had thought of primarily as a dancer, proved the surprise with his fine, strong voice. Jacquii Marshall, mostly seen as an ensemble singer in shows (Doo Wop, Street Dreams, Generations, and Stomping at the Savoy) made a fine impression in her first solo appearance. She has the voice, the pizzazz, and the stage presence to do well as a cabaret performer.

This handsome team plans to reprise the show, so if you missed this one, catch it next time around. Meantime, both are appearing in the musical, You Can Lead a Horse to Water at the Julian. Paul Ferris, impressive as usual, served as musical director. Special recognition is also warranted for the excellent back-up vocals of Maurice Long and Sterling Cotton.

"The Magic is You," Marcia Harp's one woman song/dance/magic act, took to the stage of the Plush Room during June. She put together a fine selection of seldom-heard songs and proved once again that she knows how to sell a lyric. Perhaps best known as a dancer (the tipsy girl in the cocktail glass in Dance Between the Lines), her vocals were especially appealing in the current show. Opening with her golden shoes magic illusion, she moved into a couple of songs that included the very effective "Woman in the Moon." Two jazz dance numbers were hampered by the presence of two grand pianos on the already small stage, though a later tap number worked to better advantage. (It's risky business attempting to dance on a cabaret stage where arms and legs and numbers vary from week to week. There were some fine voices in evidence on the Sunday I attended, and while the original skits seemed to lack point and sharp focus, the operatic presentations were all winners.

are seldom visible beyond the first two rows.) The tap number, in clown costume, was danced to a song written especially for the show, "On Stage," by her accompanist Bob Bendorff.

I also liked Ms. Harp's presentation of Billy Barnes' "Something Cool" and the Lionel Ritchie song "Hello." A medley of "Out Here on My Own" and "If You Believe" segued beautifully into another illusion as her body floated in air. I've seen her do this bit of magic several times and it still amazes me!

Her final medley of "It's About Magic" and "The Magic is You" closed with her dropping the golden shoes into a bag, then revealing that the bag is empty, as the tapping shoes materialized in the glass case.

"Bye-Bye Verdi", a humorous operatic entertainment, is firmly entrenched in Mame's Gondola Room on Sunday afternoons. Arias from the standard classical repertoire are loosely strung together with some original lyrics, dialogue and music by Sam Bittner, who also serves as the voice-over announcer. The cast

Vocally, the show was full of nice surprises. Susan Narucki and Eric Morris opened with "Parigi o cara" from Traviata, and I was immediately impressed with Morris' charismatic tenor. His subsequent solo, a rousing Rossini tarantella, was a special crowd pleaser. Soprano Narucki later delivered the Jewel Song from Faust with vocal purity as well as wit and charm.

Linda Nourie, whose youth seems to belie her considerable talent, brought a gorgeous voice to an aria from Don Pasquale and later lent considerable power to the final quartet from Lucia. Baritone Bill Neely soloed on a Dr. Malatesta aria from Rigoletto. As Teresa Cardinale mimed the shearing of Samson's locks, she produced a beautifully seductive, richly colored and emotionally shaded "Mon coeur a'ouvre a ta voix."

Special guest of the afternoon was Elizabeth Enman, whose fully assured mezzo created a moving Azucena in "Strida la vampa" from Il Trovatore. Superbly sung. Steve Binder on the piano lent excellent support to the talented company.

"Bye-Bye, Verdi" plays Mame's on Sunday, Aug. 5 and 26 at 3:30 p.m.

Women in Music: Part II

Before we go into the archives for older examples of women and music, let's look at a very contemporary woman and see how she fits into the picture.

Laurie Anderson is a graduate of Cal-Arts and is essentially a performance artist—whose medium happens to be music. This sounds denigrating, when it shouldn't be. It is the highest tribute to her work that it has gained commercial success in spite of its innovative character.

In 1977 Laurie was included in two anthologies, one that was of women only. The cuts presented included one called "Juanita" which was a song based on a piece of tape strung on the violin bow on which was recorded the word Juanita. When played, the bow makes sounds and words that take on meaning both forwards and backwards. It sounded like aural language poetry and was unforgettable. One of her more famous pieces of the time was also included ("New York Social Life") which, by the use of rhythm and careful word choice, constructs the total picture of modern social isolationism where one can be alone with countless acquaintances. Up to this point technology has largely not entered the picture and her voice is undisguised and unaltered.

With "O Superman" in 1980, Laurie entered the bigtime with Warner Brothers. She begins to use vocoders, farfisa, and other electronic devices to create a chatty Big Brother sound. What is interesting is that the song takes on (as does all her work) so much more depth when seen performed. The song is from her magnum opus "United States I-IV" and is an all-encompassing look at what it is to be American by someone who is critical, cynical, and yet loving. All her work is about ideas. Not just women's ideas, but peoples' issues.

So what's the big deal? It strikes me as a noteworthy accomplishment that any woman can present work that is socially and artistically relevant without resorting to exploitation and also to capture the interest of current rock "greats" as Peter Gabriel and Adrian Belew. Art-rock, aside from Talking Heads, has never been a very popular genre, but with the advent of people like Laurie that may be changing, even though I doubt most know what they're really listening to. That's not important in one way. An old saying goes, "the real work is done in the silence." Anything that opens people up to new horizons of musical realization is fine with me.

But in spite of, and because of, the fact that she is such a ground breaker for women in music, she walks the line. She, like others before her of both genders, has a choice. She is now moderately popular among the art crowd and the intelligencia, with enough appeal to other less-obvious fans to satisfy Warner. She can either succumb to their probable exhortations to get broader appeal or stick to her guns. You can either be a commercial success or artistically sound. (I didn't make the rules.) Another push is, of course, for more and more material faster and faster, resulting in things being cut before their time. So I hope she remains centered, and continues to produce non-sexist music with brains and a beat.

Next time we'll look at Joni Mitchell and see how you can refuse to be a victim even when most of your songs are about being victimized.

Reviews:

O.M.D.: Junk Culture, LP, Virgin.

Well they got half the title right! (No, not culture!!!)

Siouxsie And The Banshees:

Dazzle, 12", Wonderland;
Hyaena, LP, Wonderland.

Oh dear, oh dear, ohdearohdearohdear. What's a fan to do? Her last album, A Kiss in the Dreamhouse, was very bad. This album doesn't have enough of anything in it to call bad. It is so forgettable. There are, at best, two songs that are passable, the rest is as unforced as the new Cure album. Robert Smith plays guitar on this album, by the way, and much of the base and guitar line smacks of the Cure. The trouble is that it doesn't suit Siouxsie. The 12" version of Dazzle and the other two cuts on the B-side are better than any of the album material. Muddy is the word that best describes the material, and hearing it live has not changed my view. A few more blows to my musical constitution and I'll be one of those people who talks about the death of music.

Associates:

Those First Impressions, 12", WEA.

The lovers have broken up and the Mackenzie half reveals how terrible his taste can be. Stinko-o-o-o.

Gene Loves Jezebel:

Shame, EP, Situation.

Their last record (Influenza) stank so much this one would look good by comparison but it really is better than that. "Gorgeous" is just that, a wonderful bluesy, soulful song that's the best cut here. The rest is good, but as much so as previous work.

THEATRE

A Horse to Water

Reviewed by Gene Price

Winston Saunder's You Can Lead a Horse to Water is a powerful, emotionally charged drama that thrusts its protagonist inexorably into his final act of matricide. The setting is Bahamian, a backwater shanty town, far from the glitter of resort society, but the theme is universal.

A contemporary treatment of a subject as old as Greek tragedy, the play opens with the silhouetted figures of the chorus (a jury) chanting the verdict of a murder trial: "Guilty...as charged." The words, "as charged," are chillingly reprised, among other key phrases, throughout the drama. The set, an economical use of platforms and risers, suggests on one side a jail cell, on the other, the family's 7 x 11 foot house. At the rear, a judge presides over the jury box, and as the tragedy unfolds in flashbacks, the characters move centerstage to enact their versions of what actually happened and what they think may have happened, and what they choose to tell the court that happened.

As Son, the youth who recounts his story from the jail cell, Reuben Renaudo Dumas creates a memorable characterization. Fatherless, somewhere between 14 and 17, he loves not only too much, but demands too much love in return. He is tough, he is defiant, but as the lawyer peels away at the cause of his crime, we come to realize he is not so much a victim of his social stratum as he is of his own possessive passion.

Son has assumed the head of household role over a sometimes working mother, a speechless brother and two sisters. Each child had been sired by a different lover, the result of "sounds in the night and moaning" that continue to come from behind the kitchen/bedroom curtain where his mother entertains her lovers. Son's love (and shame) for his mother grows into an all-consuming obsession, a dream of removing her and his younger brother, Old Fool, to a faraway house where just the three of them will live and love each other.

But his dream, his passion, is out of control. Even at the end, "guilty as charged," he is unrepentant, adamant that you have to do more than just lead someone, you have to make them do what is best for them (him). Betrayed by his mother's desire to live a life other than the one he dreamed for her, he kills her. Dumas delivers a compelling performance.

Gloria Weinstock is superb as the too-young and loving mother who comes to realize that her needs and yearnings are as important to her as Son's. It is a complex, well written role and

Ladies Against Women

By Alison Wahl

Stop! Don't read this article unless you've carefully checked to make sure your hair curlers are securely fastened, your pink nail polish is the right shade to match your dress, your 2.5 children are happily eating raisins in front of the TV, and your house has passed the white glove test. Gentlemen, don't read any further unless your tie is in place, your shirttail is tucked in, you've wiped the lipstick off your sleeve, and you've checked to make sure your wife is slaving over a hot stove. If you've gone through these security measures, you now have time to read further. Does this sound like your home? If not, the Plutonium Players have an evening of "consciousness-lowering" which you can't afford to miss.

Bad Mothers, the further adventures of Ladies Against Women, is a politically incorrect satire based on the idea, "A woman's place is in the home." A troupe of six performers have cleverly created such slogans as: "Make America a Man Again—Invade Abroad;" "Restore Virginity as a High School Graduation Requirement;" and "Taking a Sweetheart of the Same Gender is as Evil as Taking a Contraceptive." The players portray stereotypical characters to depict the American dream. Gag me with a silver spoon!

The two-hour production consists of short skits carefully worked together with music and singing. The piano player sits beside the stage and has an intricate part in the production; however, more attention needs to be given to tightening the songs. It is a sloppy attempt at creating what could be a musical uplift to the show.

Bad Mothers begins with a news commentary called News Leak, a take-off on Saturday Night Live's Weekend Update. This is followed by a ten-minute home movie of Ladies Against Women, and the Plutonium Players charge through a full size movie screen on to the stage.

Unfortunately, the first act is rather slow, but the costumes more than make up for the tempo. Selma Vincent is dressed with a tacky fur which includes head, legs, and tail. She carries her outfit divinely and her characterizations are wonderful. Gail Ann Williams looks stunning in her cat eye glasses, pink apron (never leave home without it), and pillbox hat. Her squeaky nasal voice will drive anyone up a tree. Jain Angeles is the cheerleader of the group. She carries pom-poms, wears pink bedroom slippers, and rounds up the girls with her whistle cheering for L.A.W.

The players are generally talented and funny. Jeff Thompson does a nice characterization of Colonel Beaugard Lee, a southern gentleman clad in medals and chewing a cigar. Pompous Beaugard believes in turning wimps into men: W.I.M.P.S., which stands for Weak Impotent Mounds of Puke. John Barry and Jamie Mars-Walker have some nice moments, although their concentration drifts when they begin laughing at their own jokes.

The second act is much livelier, and the players capture the crowd using audience participation. By the end of the production, the Plutonium Players have a fan club. They sell buttons and bandanas and no one leaves without a pin. Ladies Against Women could be a new cult, similar to the Rocky Horror Picture Show.

The group was originally formed as part of People Against Nuclear Power in 1977, when they tactfully began invading political gatherings. Two campaigns developed through this, Reagan for Shah in 1980 and Ladies Against Women in 1981. The Plutonium Players are a non-profit theatre company and will be performing at the People's Theatre Coalition in Fort Mason through August 5.

Angels of Light are Back!

By David Lumble

Coming soon (August 24) to a theatre near you (San Francisco's Theatre Artaud) The Angels of Light (since 1970 the Bay Area's most outrageously original theatrical troupe) present a mid-summer night's fairy tale: (Daniel Curzon and Dan Turner's latest musical comedy) Cinderella Two!

Now that I've got that out of my system, let me tell you, at a far more leisurely pace, about the show that promises to be the off-off Geary musical hit of the summer.

Playwright Curzon had long been intrigued with the musical comedy possibilities of the Cinderella story, especially when he did a little research into the origins of the fairy tale. "Reading the original Brothers Grimm version, I was surprised at the major difference between that story and the Cinderella most of us carry around in our heads, probably from Walt Disney. For instance, the Grimm tale has no fairy godmother and the stepsisters have their eyes plucked out at the end! This inspired me to try to show the differences between the old story and what I hope is a more honest approach to where happiness lies.

"I was also intrigued by the figure of Cinderella's father, who is such a cypher in the original story. Why would this man let all those awful things happen to his own flesh and blood? I tried to clarify that in my sequel."

Curzon could think of only one Bay Area theatre company equal to the challenge of his kind of Cinderella story: The Angels of Light.

Rodney Price, along with partner Beaver Bauer, is co-artistic director for the Angels. As a charter-member Angel, Price charts a bit of their very special history. "The Angels have been performing together since Christmas Eve, 1970, when we staged a mock nativity scene at Grace Cathedral during Midnight Mass. The Angel, Hibiscus, starred as the Virgin Mary, and his lover played Joseph. That night, we received our first police escort off the stage."

Rodney recalls that many of the early Angels' shows were "more events than polished theatre." The Angels recruited many of their early performers from the ranks of ex-Cockettes. "So naturally, the shows reflected a lot of the nostalgic aura of '30s musicals."

Price notes that the Angels in the early '70s were a more primitive, daring and outrageous band of actors. "We had one scene in one of our early shows at the Gay Community Center at 330 Grove, one of our earliest theaters, where Miguel was singing a song he wrote entitled Looking for Super Cock! The stage setting was a row of glory holes, filled with members (literally) solicited from the audience. While Miguel was singing, Hibiscus (his lover at the time) ran in from the wings and started sucking one man's cock, which inevitably led to a live-stage lovers quarrel. As you can see, the early shows were quite x-rated, but also annihilated the closet for many people just waiting to burst out. Allen Ginsberg made his drag debut in an early show at Grove Street called Cotton Club Cabaret. He appeared as a nurse in a green plastic wig and a third eye painted on his forehead."

A Vote for the Mime Troupe

Reviewed by Leland Moss

Ronald Reagan is virtually guaranteed to be crowned President in November. It's inevitable: Mondale has loser written all over his face. There's never been any point in voting since McGovern lost. Politicians don't have any power anyway, so what difference does it make? I'm not going to register this time; it's just not worth it.

If these sentiments reflect you, dear reader, you're just the person the San Francisco Mime Troupe wants for their most recent production, 1985. Now 25 years old, the erstwhile radical theatre collective apparently feels that the most important message for our troubled times is the very same thing the establishment has been pushing for decades: Register to vote.

If you detect a note of sadness and/or sarcasm here, you're right. At a period in our history when reactionary developers, warmongers and straight male supremacists seem closer than ever to their suicidal goal, is registering to vote really the most significant thing the proletariat can do? Aside from affecting the make-up of the Supreme Court (the only possible outcome that's dramatized), what real difference will Mondale make, other than one of image? How much will the multinational corporations allow him, or any president, to deflect their unsavory intentions? The script of 1985 ignores or even downplays these difficult questions in favor of a simpler answer: Register to vote and save the world.

Maybe, as someone in the audience commented, it's a first step toward effective change. Certainly the Mime Troupe's script suggests that had we 60s radicals taken the time to vote in elections past, things wouldn't have gotten this bad today. Most of us were co-

MUSIC

By Sean Reynolds

After moving to San Francisco I began checking out the music situation in and around the Bay Area. I come from a tradition of gospel, rhythm and blues, jazz and, needless to say, Motown, so I didn't want to have to rely solely on KJAZ, KBLX and records. I wanted to see/hear some live performances. I didn't want to lose what I considered to be a foothold in the predominantly Black music scene.

I knew only a few people when I arrived, and I relied upon them heavily to show me around. I met one woman, and we became sort of "runnin' buddies," in that she would call up and say "let's" and I would say "go."

Well she took me (not literally) to a Holly-Near concert, and although I was not bored to tears, I was "concerned" that Ms. Near was not putting her "all" into the performance. Same friend took me to a Meg Christian concert, which I found ass-shiftingly dull. While I was fidgeting in my seat, my friend asked me whether or not I liked "women's music." I responded that I certainly did and would check the Pink Section of the upcoming Sunday paper in order to find out when Aretha was going to be in town.

To make a long story even longer, we stayed through the concert and afterwards had coffee and a great discussion. She surmised that Olivia Records constituted the driving force behind women's music, and furthermore, that if the music was not solely written, recorded, promoted and sung by women, that in fact said music could not be called women's music. My opinion, on the other hand, was that as long as it was sung, and sung well by a woman, that it was in fact women's music.

Needless to say, that's when the "runnin' buddy" ran out. Oh well, another one bites the dust!

Some months passed. I went to Erle's Solano Club and saw Sheila Escovedo, went somewhere else and caught Sweet Honey in the Rock, saw Theresa Trull. I was finding my niche.

Then I went to see Linda Tilley! I knew I had arrived and felt myself somewhat inside the ribbons. Not only is she big, Black and in the life, but she has a stage presence and a voice that'll knock you down! I was as happy as a sissy in a CC camp.

As she crooned her way through "Fever," written by Little Willie John and popularized by Miss Peggy Lee (why is she always called Miss Peggy Lee?), I could see at least half of the women in the crowd having hot flashes. I was cool and calm but did notice that my seat was a little wet as I went to get another of those California carbonated water drinks.

From "Fever" and subsequent hot flashes, she sang a song written by Theresa Trull, "Secrets." She started with an introduction about "people who sneak around and then tell lies to their significant others." From that intro she gripped the microphone, popped her fingers, crooked her neck and started employing all of the wonderful gestulation of rhythm and blues. She bobbed and weaved throughout the number, gave the audience highs and lows, and had everybody wondering who really had a secret! She then did a few Aretha numbers and did them almost as well as Aretha would (give her a few more years and she'll have it down pat), and then lashed into "Wade in the Water." I thought I was too through, but believe me, she hung that song out to dry. At that point a lot of Linda Tilley became crystal clear. One knew that this woman had been in the church—I mean the get down, stay all day, Jesse Jackson-Democratic-Convention-speech kind of church where gospel groups make you want to get up and testify!

I had lunch with Linda a few weeks ago and asked her where did she come from (I don't mean geographically). She said that when she was in high school, she would go home and sit around with her mother and a couple of aunts and drink and listen to Koko Taylor singing "Wang Dang Doodle." She has tremendous memories of the good times they had listening to blues sung primarily by women. All of these women together sitting around thinking about "sawdust on the floor," getting drunk, and frying fish. Sort of reminds me of my own childhood with my Aunt Agnes. Although I don't think it necessary to know where a person comes from to understand who she is, it is important to understand why she is.

Despite all that has been said about the pros and cons of women's music, Linda Tilley stands out. She has been making music for the last sixteen years and doing it extra well. She has performed at some of those "sawdust on the floor" places in Oakland where bump and grind is the order of the day, and I saw her recently at Kimball's, in a benefit for the Bay Area Jazz Society, where everything was almost quite proper. In each situation she gave all that she had to give, didn't hold anything back and captivated the audience (with a smile).

If I wore a hat I'd take it off to Linda Tilley. Advice: don't rely on friends, check the Pink, call the Baybrick, look at bulletin boards, do whatever, but don't miss her next performance. Needless to say, I'll be there.

THE SANE ZONE

BY LINDA MOAKES

Welcome to the August SANE-ZONE: A dimension of vacations, a dimension of boredom, a dimension of transitions. When August hits, can school be far behind? WHO INVENTED AUGUST ANYWAY? Statistically, during this month:

- more atomic bombs have been dropped
- more people move and buy homes
- there are no legal or illegal holidays
- overachievers overpopulate the parks benches, roads
- the boom industries are loose leaf notebook printers and the new underwear industry

Astrologically, Leo and Virgo have a lot to do with the energy of August. As a collector of astrological lightbulb jokes, I offer the following as a partial explanation of this peculiar month. How many Leos does it take to screw in a lightbulb? Ten: one to do it and nine to applaud. And Virgos? None...it would never be perfect enough. From the ego to the ether... "can you say profound? Can you say that?" One ancient holiday does happen on the first of August. Lammis, the harvest festival, marks the midpoint between summer solstice and the fall equinox. Other than that you may want to check out Saturday nights at Valencia Rose. One character you may see there as well as other places around town is the like Valley Girl of gay comedy, Danny Williams.

Danny Williams likes to "observe" the gay community and how we relate (a comedic voyeur?). He also enjoys "exposing" the ways the "straight" world relates to us (A comedic flasher?). "In my bit about the Gay Games I joke about being disappointed that they didn't include coffee table decoration and sarcasm. That's funny to me because that is one way the world thinks we excel and the stereotype does exist in our community." Welcome to the August "Never-Never Land" time of the year, as Sanezone presents Mr. Danny Williams.

[Sanzeone:] What inspired you to begin doing comedy?

[Danny:] I started doing comedy the day after my 30th birthday. I knew my life was over and I was going to die. I used to walk around fearing death. One day I was sitting in a restaurant and I started crying because I realized that Julia Childs is going to die some day. If you're sitting in Pam Pam's, eating steak soup and crying because Julia Childs is going to die...well, it's time for comedy.

Do you have any goals? [I got this question from a book.]

My goal in life is to watch soap operas all day. I figure I'd get my mind completely flushed of everything. It's a new way to achieve a clear state of consciousness. We could wear the same color outfits and wear different soap opera characters around our necks. I'm addicted to "As The World Turns" and I'm in love with Steve Andropoulos. He's so neat...and beautiful.

What do you admire about him?

He has a nice chest.

That's lofty.

Yea...that's a good quality...something I've always wanted but never had. I respect that. I also watch "Dark Shadows" so I can remember that I used to want to be a vampire and I don't have to think.

So the goal here is to not think or feel or relate?

Yea...Let others do it for you.

Danny, are you overdue for a vacation?

Am I? Honey, am I...yea.

Well, let's get on with it...where do you buy your clothes?

I hate shopping!

But, you're queer...you mean you weren't born to shop?

I'm born to shop for books. I could spend my life shopping for books...in between soap operas. I'm one of those disgusting, obnoxious people who reads and walks at the same time. I could walk home reading a book through a freeway and never get hit. When I'm not reading I walk into telephone poles.

I hate shopping for clothes...nothing ever fits. "Sorry, we don't have those neat clothes in your size but we do have these checkered green pants over here."

What is the source of your material in your comedy world?

I get most of my jokes from my dreams. Almost every routine I have has come out of my dreams: Bob Damron. BAR. Sometimes I get concepts and sometimes I get specific lines. My dreams are very literal, and I work stuff out in them.

Have you had any dreams in the last 2 years?

Hey, what the hay, ladies and germs...I like talking about my dreams and my spiritual path but I'm against proselytizing. To me the sign that a spiritual path is not a good one is when they put you out on the streets to hand out something. If Jehovah's Witnesses were really together they would not have to wake me up at seven in the morning to sell their damn magazine. The prayer in school thing is really weird. If they do pass the law then Muslims can insist that their prayers be included. Do you think Jerry Falwell wants his grandchildren to pray to Allah? What they mean is Christianity and I wish they'd be honest about it. Can you see kids doing Rajneesh meditations "OK...coaine kids! Let's jump up and down for three hours now!"

Let's pretend we're watching Rolls Royces drive by!

I'm absolutely sure God did not create us to all wear the same clothes. It's weird, you know...The Sikhs don't cut their hair. OK. But the Hare Krishnas have to shave their heads except for this part and they have to wear a certain outfit. Do you like really think that like the spiritual force that like created the universe said, "I've given you hair but you must shave it except for one area and it has to hang like this or else you roast forever."? What!! Is God a hairdresser?" "Pageboys...You all have to wear pageboys!"

Well, my little choirboy...this is your moment to get philosophical with the folks at home.

I think that the creative impulse is the most important thing we've got going for us. I think everyone should find out what it is in them that's creative and go for it! We all have it. It's sad to me when I see people look at comics and say, "Oh, that's creative; what I do isn't." There are people who cook creative and clean creative. Realize what you do is creative and make your whole life a creative act.

Danny Williams and his new checkered green pants will be performing with Jane Dornacker in Modesto for an AIDS benefit in September. Danny claims that the Royal Court in Modesto "...throws the best parties, period!" That Valley Guy will be like there, Miss Thing. If you're wondering how many Danny Williams' it takes to screw in a lightbulb...ask him, I'm sure he knows.

So what else is happening in August? Well, Gay Comedy Open Mike is alive and well on Monday nights with Tom Ammiano and the fabulous Suzy Berger (she may be short but she's no slouch...). On August 4 at Gay Comedy Night you can catch the Saturday night (A.K.A. "paid") debut of Ellen Brook Davis and Laurie Bushman. Be a groupie...be there at Valencia Rose at 10 pm.

Fortunately, the incomparable "Hissy Fits" will be presented again this month! And finally, I'm happy to announce that in honor of August, I'm taking a vacation around town. I'm available for interesting dates with my friends, and if you write to me I'll really be able to save therapy dollars for the movies...See you in September's column featuring the comedy stylings of Gomez and Palacios. Address any letters to Jokes for Moakes, c/o Coming Up!, 867 Valencia St, San Francisco, CA 94110. And remember... "when in doubt, do."

THINGS THAT NEED TO BE SAID

BY DANIEL CURZON

Miss America should certainly not resign! I don't suppose the lesbian poses, even if pseudo, had anything to do with the officials' distress, did they? It was just the nudity! Hah! Will we never get over this crazy attitude about the flesh being something you mustn't show? You can go on a beach and display everything but a few little places and nobody cares, but if you remove a few more inches and show yourself "as God made you," or enjoying yourself sexually, then you have to resign. No wonder I get enraged at the stupidity of the human race so often. (Although lately the rage has turned mostly to resignation.)

Walter Mondale may lack "charisma," but so what? Adolf Hitler had lots of charisma. I'd rather have a liberal plodder than a showy speechifier. Oratorical speeches that move you to tears—or warfare—are no reasons to elect anybody to office. Indeed, it's downright dangerous to be swayed by demagogues.

Are people really going to vote for Ferraro "because she is a woman"? This makes no sense to me. Margaret Thatcher is a woman, or at least it is so rumored. What counts is the person, not the genitals. I hope I never vote for anybody because he/she is gay or black or female or any other irrelevant reason. To me the human race is ineffably primitive in the way it's still swayed by symbols and noise. And my blood curdled when the subject of who is the "better Christian" surfaced! Save us from religionists!

I watched only a few minutes of the Democratic Convention coverage. I'm afraid I can't get a hard-on for politics, no matter how I may try. I just don't CARE! I'll bet my reason is more common than all this talk you hear about people not voting because they are turned off to this or that particular candidate or policy. Most people simply don't give a damn. And actually, that shows just how strong the American political system, in its basics, really is. People don't vote because they don't fear for one moment losing the right to vote!

I haven't been seeing much theater lately. I have resigned from the Bay Area Theater Critics Circle, largely because I was burning out. I think critics see too much and get surly and overly critical. It's better not to go and enjoy what you do see a little more.

I've been working on a screenplay with a medical hypnotist in Marin. It's quite amazing what hypnotists can do to rid people of their phobias. A session or two of hypnotherapy, versus years of psychoanalysis, can rid someone of a debilitating neurosis. Strangely enough, Hollywood hasn't, (to my knowledge), done anything on this fascinating subject.

Of course you're going to vote for Tim Wolf for the College Board of City College, aren't you? I'm not very political, but I've worked closely with Tim the past two years as a faculty part-timer at the college, and so I know what a diplomatic and dedicated person he is. He does the gay community, and every other community, proud because of his talents. Tim is raising funds now for re-election.

The AIDS Project that Theatre Rhinoceros is sponsoring looks quite promising. It's going to be a theatrical piece incorporating sketches, monologues, songs, and dances all on the subject of AIDS and the various human connections with the crisis. Interestingly enough, lots of it will be humorous. The plan is to take the show on the road to any and all groups that may need to know more about the subject in an entertaining format.

The Lesbian/Gay March down Market Street was so low-key that we're almost becoming part of the sidewalk! The punks have become more colorful, more dramatic. There were too many speakers, etc., allowed too much time each. We may be overloading a bit on speeches, all of them pretty much interchangeable. I sometimes wonder if anybody non-gay is listening anyway. Are we simply talking to and at each other, while the world at large goes on calling "Faggot!" and "Cocksucker!" when it wants to really put somebody down?

Even John Belushi as quoted in Wired made several anti-gay remarks, being particularly spiteful about men who "take it up" the you-know-what. And Belushi was supposed to be the new generation! But from that book, he emerges as a talented but pathetic slob living a sordid, drug-riddled life that may or may not prove to be a lesson to anybody else. Ah, what if your life is a mess, and then it's not even useful to others as a bad example! The horror! The horror!

Filmmaker Artie Bressan

BY DAVID LAMBLE

Arthur J. Bressan, Jr. is the most eclectic of modern gay filmmakers. His oeuvre has an astonishing range, from gay documentary (Gay USA, the 1978 response to Anita Bryantism) to straight documentary (Thank You, Mr. President, the PBS-aided JFK assassination memorial film) to full-length gay feature (Abuse, "My battered child movie") to gay male pornography (Passing Strangers, Forbidden Letters, Pleasure Beach and Daddy Dearest, "a sexy, feel-good, gay movie") to a projected regular mainstream comedy (Inside Norma Garland, "combining Norma Desmond and Judy Garland in a burlesque of the porno industry").

The first work of Artie Bressan's that came to my attention was not a film, but a sign that proclaimed "Blackie Norton for Supervisor." The sign was planted in the front window of the Market Street apartment Artie occupied before ending a twelve-year San Francisco run in 1979. For the past five years Artie has made New York City his home and filmmaking center. "Since I've left, I've gotten more attention from what has to be my favorite town, San Francisco."

I write this article, the first of two dealing with films of Artie Bressan, from the flat immediately below his old "Blackie Norton" digs. Part one of my conversation with Bressan will deal with the making of Gay USA and his career as a self-proclaimed gay pornographer, especially focusing on his latest gay X, Daddy Dearest.

A scene from Daddy Dearest

[Coming Up:] You are a filmmaker, going back quite a ways, and are known in this community, in the past, for having done Gay USA, a documentary around the [Lesbian/Gay Freedom Day] parade in 1977.

[Bressan:] It was a big response to the Anita Bryant witch hunt and, basically, was a lot of demonstrations that took place that Gay Day. I put all the footage together and made one long parade film, sort of as a "Triumph of the Gay Will" against Anita Bryant.

It was a parade film to top all parade films...

It's the longest one...

People talked about their views, it wasn't just visions of people marching around...

Well, the idea I had was to have people talk about their private lives, coming out, their lovers, their problems, in the swirl of the public parade, so that instead of just watching a talking head, the way you usually do in a documentary, there was visual material around that person speaking, and it created some wonderful antithetical moments: a lesbian talking about coming out in Kansas City and behind her lots of women marching against work in the home and that sort of thing. It was an entertaining film and that's what I did with my anger. I thought if people could see lots of gay people and their straight friends in a moment of celebration, it might be the antidote to the sort of venom and negativity which the Anita Bryant movement was about, turning people against each other.

Now, as a filmmaker, your career can't be neatly categorized because you've done Gay USA, a documentary, you've some erotic features, what you call your x-rated films. Or do you call them porno?

Well, I always call them the worst that they're called, so that other people, after they see them, can call them the best that they're called. So I always call them pornos, and then when people see my films, they always sort of grab me by the shoulder and they say, "Well, that's not really porno, that's an erotic film, or it's a very sensual experience, why do you call it porno?" I feel if I call it the nadir, perhaps they will call it the peak. It would be wrong for me to call it something wonderful, and then for it not live up to that.

If you ever got a reputation as a pornographer, which you don't have, it would make things difficult for you as a filmmaker, wouldn't it?

Yes. Everybody's interested in sex and everyone has lewd things to say about it, lurid things, but when you actually take a stand, let's say at a dinner party, when asked what do you do? I say, "I make pornographic films. I'm a pornographer." People then drop their spoons in the fruit cocktail and they look over at the host, as if to say, "Who invited him?" meaning me, until I stand up and they see I'm 6'4" and you might have a fight on your hands. Pornographer is just a cultural name. I am a pornographer. I make pornographic films. I don't think I fit what the public thinks is the profile. I do consider all my films to be real films, with stories, beginnings, middles, ends, helicopter shots, rehearsals, casts; and whether they're in the X genre, or the documentary genre, or the dramatic genre, like Abuse, I try to treat them with all equal maniacal, obsessive concern.

Now, Passing Strangers, Forbidden Letters, and your latest, Daddy Dearest, are all erotic films?

Yes. Passing Strangers, I shot here in San Francisco. It came out in 1974. Forbidden Letters was quite a time coming. It was a real low budget film. It finally came out in 1979 and went to the Berlin International Film Festival. It was the first x-rated gay film ever to get across the water in that particular way.

What was the inspiration for Forbidden Letters?

I was in the hospital with hepatitis and I was writing to this kid in prison in Mississippi, a young thief. I think the fourth letter came back stamped, "This should go to a female prisoner." And it had a lot of formal stamps from the state of Mississippi on it, and it was clear to me that the mail was being monitored, at least that letter. Since I had been careful, but had been emotional and signed a man's name, my own, they assumed that it should go to a woman prisoner. They insisted that there was no such prisoner at his prison number. Out of anger at that aborted, by letter, relationship came the animus, the driving force for doing Forbidden Letters. It became a film about prison told from the outside. It's about two lovers who are separated by a year in prison. An older guy is put in prison for mugging someone and his younger lover waits for him but can't send him any letters directly, because he's aware that the prison officials would read the mail and know that his lover is gay. So he keeps a journal of his forbidden letters, that he never mails, but that we're privy to in the film. Forbidden Letters was a real breakthrough film for me because all the Europeans, most of whom had never seen a full-length American porno feature, were really disturbed, shocked and shaken up to see Forbidden Letters, which is a highly personal, emotional sexual experience.

I do consider all my films to be real films....whether they're in the X genre, or the documentary genre, or the dramatic genre, I try to treat them all with equal maniacal, obsessive concern.

Is the film too arty for the standard gay male porno market?

Oh, not at all! The biggest problem it has was summed up by a younger guy I know, who thought it was depressing because it talks about lovers, and love and most porno films don't really deal with that any more. The problem with it for the video market is that forty percent of the film is in black and white and the major flashback is in color, which is about forty-five minutes.

Why is it that most of the gay male pornos don't deal with love?

To a certain degree, it's passe. It's also threatening on an emotional level. Many of the filmmakers correctly assume that too much emotion will disconnect the hard-ons of some or many of the patrons in the theatres. I know many people who have lovers, who prefer to get their anonymous sex through pornography. On a deeper level, it's much more difficult to portray emotional states visually with porno actors than it is to portray well-photographed bodies and orgasms. So it's a two-pronged problem: One, what does the public want? Two, does the filmmaker have the experience, inclination and talent to deliver something that is admitted by all to be more difficult than mere sex. Even Katherine Hepburn said once, in her condemnation of pornography, "I don't think you can film love." Well, I've been pretty good at doing it!

Have you ever played voyeur and watched the audience at a sex theatre watch one of your films?

Always! Since I know the film by heart, I sit with my back to the screen and watch the audience watch the film. The ads for my films usually give showtimes. Unlike with some porno films, the audience comes on time, stays seated and really takes in the film. No one uses the sex arcades behind the screen. But as soon as the film is over, there's a miniature stampede to the arcades to have sex. With Forbidden Letters, Passing Strangers and Pleasure Beach the audience stays to watch the whole film. My latest, Daddy Dearest, which I angled in a different way, has some of the crowd getting up during sex scenes and changing their seats, looking for action. Daddy Dearest is aimed at the purely erotic and the genitals of the audience.

Passing Strangers is a good title. What's the story about?

Passing Strangers is about an eighteen year old boy who's only had sex in his mind. He answers a sex ad in the Berkeley Barb because he finally wants to meet somebody. The ad is in the form of a poem: "Passing stranger, you do not know how longingly I look after you. I was a boy with you. I grew up with you. I ate and slept with you. I awake at night alone and I know that we shall meet again." After an exchange of letters, the boy learns that the man copied the poem from a book by Walt Whitman. Eventually, they meet and we see them for one day and one night together. They have sex on Angel Island out in the sunshine. Then they go to the Gay Day celebration. It's a very, very lyrical, very beautiful film, almost a purely silent picture, meaning it's voice over music, but very little sync dialogue. Passing Strangers came out in 1974, and everyone really loved it; it was the culmination of my own coming out, my own sort of gay hippiedom in San Francisco. The film still plays in New York all the time. It's in limited video distribution, again it's faulted in the video world because the first half of the picture is in black and white, before the boy and the guy get together and then it switches into very beautiful color.

Have you, like Wakefield Poole (Boys in the Sand and Bijou), tried to get beyond the limits of the gay porno film artistically?

Wakefield was an imagist. He always worked through the mode of style. My films were always story films and I've always believed in narrative being, basically, the quintessential American style. I think that Americans believe in stories more than documents or images. So Wakefield was working in style and imagery and I was working in trying to tell the traditional story, using sexual imagery to advance the plot.

I bear that your latest porno, Daddy Dearest, is a hot film.

Daddy Dearest is my first porno film or erotic classic made in New York City, where I now live. I wanted to make a film in light of what's going on with the AIDS crisis. I wanted to make what I would call a "feel-good" gay movie. Gay sex, gay lovemaking and gay eroticism has come under great criticism and debate recently, and I thought it would be nice to make a film that was beautiful, sensual, sexual and erotic and to, perhaps, remind people

A Treasure of Black Women's History

We Are Your Sisters, Black Women in the Nineteenth Century, Dorothy Sterling, ed., W.W. Norton and Co., New York, 1984; $22.50.

Reviewed by Paula Ross

To read We Are Your Sisters, Black Women in the Nineteenth Century is to experience a strange sense of history as living, breathing, and ever-present. The women who tell their stories, from the days of slavery, through emancipation, reconstruction, the rise of the Klan and an emerging generation of freedwomen, are startlingly close, vivid and articulate. They began the journey across the River Jordan, and we, their daughters, will only reach the other side because our foremothers refused to sink.

Most history is written from the top down—the exploits of conquerors, the imperialism of presidents and kings, the concerns of the small but powerful aristocracies that battle and support them. History "from the bottom up" literally turns that approach on its head. And when it does, the world becomes brand new. The grunts tell a vastly different story of war than do the generals. Women experience almost any historical event or period differently than do men. And enslaved, oppressed peoples' perceptions are usually patronized, if not totally ignored by those who write the books, who record the wars, the conquests and the defeats.

We Are Your Sisters presents an excellent example of a particular history of this country, at a particular time, as seen by a population considered less than human, "the mule of the world," the Black woman. While slavery shaped an entire race of people, the shape it gave to Black women needs its own distinct voice. And Sterling has assembled an impressive collection of diary excerpts, letters, newspaper articles and advertisements, speeches and reminiscences in which Black women present the details of their lives.

For the most part, Sterling organizes her material chronologically, beginning with "Slavery Time," followed by a section on free women; moving into the Civil War years, emancipation, post-war and ending with profiles of four women selected as representative of a cross-section of Black women at the end of the nineteenth, moving into the twentieth century.

As Sterling notes in the introduction to Part One ("Slavery Time"), it's not that the subject of slavery in the United States has been neglected: "...there has been an endless flow—at times a trickle, at times a torrent—of books... Yet few have been written from the point of view of the slave, and fewer still have permitted us to hear the voice of the female slave." This omission, she remarks, cannot be blamed on a lack of material. Journalists, teachers and local historians interviewed slave women in the nineteenth century. A few women wrote their own personal accounts of slave life. And in the 1920s and 1930s, more than two thousand former slaves were interviewed by the Works Progress Administration (WPA), Federal Writers' Project and Fisk and Southern universities. Some of these interviews were published. Most, however, languished in typescript for almost forty years in the Rare Book Room of the Library of Congress. They gathered proverbial dust because historians questioned the validity of this incredible wealth of eyewitness testimony. Clearly, the bias of the white slave owners and their supporters, even the northern observers of the U.S. South's "peculiar institution" was not considered an obstacle to veracity. The bias of those imprisoned by that institution, however, "invalidated" their words and their memories of what their lives had been like. All biases are equal, but some are more equal than others.

The civil rights struggles in the 1960s precipitated a renewed interest in these narratives; and by the end of the 1970s, an eighteen volume collection (edited by George P. Rawick) reproduced the original WPA and Fisk University interviews.

The women who speak in We Are Your Sisters will challenge many myths about Black people, about Black women, and will flesh out the bare bones of pictures that have become clichéd staples of the skewed history we have been taught.

Those Amazonian women who had their babies in the fields or returned to work a day after childbirth were few and far between. p. 39

Few white persons of either sex, are willing to spend their lives and bury their talents in performing menial, servile labor. And such is the horrible idea that I entertain respecting a life of servitude, that if I conceived of there being no possibility of rising above the condition of servant, I would gladly hail death as a welcome messenger.

Maria W. Stewart (1803-1879), p.153.

What will no doubt surprise many readers of this book is the number of slave women who were literate, defying laws that made it a crime for slaves to be taught to read and write. True, many of the women dictated their thoughts to sympathetic scribes, but not always. And the significance of this defiance runs headlong into another favorite myth about slavery—that family life was virtually non-existent, or at best, not very important. The letters here certainly prove that theory erroneous. Escaped slave women wrote family and friends to let them know that they'd arrived safely in free territory. Freed slave women wrote ex-masters requesting permission to buy husbands, children or other relatives. And women whose partners or children had either escaped or otherwise gained freedom, wrote letters ranging from congratulatory joy to outraged insistence that their freedom also be obtained. [Since this book deals with Black women, there is no record here of slave owners' reactions to receiving mail from their runaway property!]

Though writing letters then was often like tossing words into a void, an infrequent correspondence was sometimes enough to lead to family reunions decades later. Until the 1900s, newspapers were filled with notices of people searching for daughters, sons, mothers, fathers, aunts, uncles and cousins, sold long ago.

Fight, and if you can't fight, kick; if you can't kick, then bite.

Slave woman to her daughter

The issue of resistance is a perfect example of history only partly told. Slave rebellions occurred throughout the 3½ centuries that slavery flourished in this country. But women are only peripherally included in any discussions of those rebellions and acts of resistance. (Harriet Tubman is one exception.) Yes, there are the occasional tales of the cook who seasons the dinner of her owners with ground glass. But Sterling has uncovered a much broader range of activities that slave women performed in protest against their involuntary servitude. Some ran away, hiding in caves, for months at a time, sometimes for years. Some fought back.

...he just thought he would hit Lucy a few licks, but she jumped on him and like to tore him up. p. 57

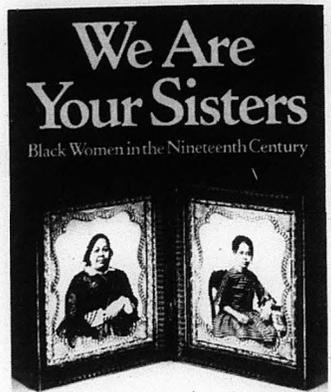

"I'm going to kill you. These black titties sucked you, and then you come out here to beat me." And when she left him he wasn't able to walk. p. 59

Some mutilated themselves to prevent being sold away from family and home. And others, in total despair, killed the children they couldn't save from being sold from them.

While many slaves ran away and remained close to home, most escaped to the North. But Canada was the real dreamed-of paradise, particularly after the 1850 passage of the Fugitive Slave Law in the United States. This legislation allowed any white man to swear that any Black person was his runaway slave. Once sworn, a U.S. Commissioner was obliged to send the "fugitive" into slavery without allowing any testimony from the person accused. Consequently, "thousands of former slaves and their families who had been living free for years left homes and jobs to flee into Canada." In the 1850s a third of the population of Chatham, Ontario, were Blacks from the U.S.; it became known as "the colored man's Paris." (Sterling neglects to mention that after the Civil War, Canadian terrorism against Blacks escalated, forcing many Blacks to flee Canada for the U.S. on a reverse underground railroad. See Blacks in Deep Snow: Black Pioneers in Canada, Colin A. Thomson; J.M. Dent and Sons, Canada, 1979.)

The definitive history of American Black women cannot possibly be told in four hundred pages, if indeed any single publication could do so. However, what We Are Your Sisters accomplishes is the discovery of yet more pieces of an incredibly complex quilt. Because of the sources tapped by Sterling, it will be easier to examine the lives of individual Black women as well as expand our knowledge of Black people as a whole. As editor, Sterling has presented these Black women in their own words whenever possible. Her skill has created a smoothly flowing work that reads more like a novel than a history book. It's almost as if she has unearthed an archetypal Black woman, born a slave, and followed her through a century that encompasses an entire lifetime.

Unlike many editorial structures, Sterling's device of introducing each part (and each chapter within each part) works well, as does the commentary interspersed between the individual women's diary entries, letters and other materials. She is rarely intrusive. Rather, she provides context and background, sewing the pieces of this historical quilt together in such a way that the seams are of as much interest and use as the fabric they bring together.

The definitive history of American Black women also cannot possibly be told without including the experiences of Black lesbians. On this score, Sterling lamentably scores a solid zero. (And why am I surprised?) Not a sentence, not a phrase, not a word. The choices of nineteenth century Black women not to marry are attributed solely to economics—marriage did not, as it did for many white women, guarantee any financial improvement—or to the shortage of suitable Black men—killed or missing in war, sold away, etc. So it is necessary to read Sterling's work, and any other histories that deny our presence, with other sources by our side. Without some previous knowledge of the lives of sculptor Mary Edmonia Lewis (1845?-1911), Alice Dunbar-Nelson (1875-1935), and writer and teacher Angelina Weld Grimké (1880-1958), I may have accepted Sterling's quilt as truly representative. She has made an obvious effort to include Black women of all classes and a variety of political views. And her exclusion of Black lesbians may or may not be excused based on the timing of the recent release of material on the subject. However, anyone writing a history of Black women in this country cannot plead that excuse from this point forward. Alongside Sterling, at least three other resources are mandatory in order to keep this particular quilt true: Black Lesbians, An Annotated Biography, J.R. Roberts, ed.; Naiaid Press, 1981; $5.95; All the Women are White, All the Blacks are Men, But Some of Us are Brave, Gloria T. Hull, Patricia Bell Scott, Barbara Smith, eds; Feminist Press, 1982, $8.95; and Home Girls, A Black Feminist Anthology, Barbara Smith, ed., Kitchen Table Press, 1983; $10.95.

Sterling commits some other annoying gaffes, surprising given her dedication to uncovering unknown or rarely heard voices. A number of photographs have no dates, not even approximate ones. It is sometimes difficult to determine the year in which some events occurred. And the last part, "Epilogue: Four Women," forces the reader to hunt through the entire section in order to determine that the four women are Frances Anne Rollin, 1847-1901; Mary Virginia Montgomery, 1849?-1922; Laura Hamilton, 1864-1898; and Ida B. Wells, 1862-1929. She also occasionally draws conclusions about the psyches of Black people as a race for which there is no supporting evidence in any of the book's documents. This would be a questionable practice in any case, but takes on even larger implications when a white woman is speaking about Black women.

We Are Your Sisters is a very valuable resource. It belongs in every library in this country. Not only does it demonstrate how recent the history of slavery is to us today, but it illustrates the tremendous leaps Black people have made in this country. We have been forced to pay an outrageous price for our lives here. The odds against us living full lives were, and remain, staggering. With the publication of books like We Are Your Sisters, there is no excuse for anyone to remain ignorant of our current struggles or of the history of our arrival at the point where we are in the River now.

Reviewed by Leland Moss

If you read the raves displayed in the ads for Another Country, you might think that the film is yet another prettily photographed study of the eternal English class struggle. Rex Reed informs us that the movie demonstrates "how 'playing the game' is required of the British upper classes." David Ansen praises its picture of "this peculiarly English world of orthodoxy and eccentricity, passion and repression," and Stanley Kauffman is quoted as saying it's "wonderfully rich."

Well, yes. What they're quoted as saying is certainly true. But either the critics are conspiring with the distributors to woo non-gay audiences to see the film or the PR people are playing it real safe. Or maybe these critics are simply unutterably dense (or closeted). Whatever the reasons, the fact remains that the public at large has been led to expect that the movie is "about" the English public school system and how, in the '30s, it somehow produced a group of aristocratic Communist spies.

Another Country is as much about that as Alice in Wonderland is about the wild and wacky things kids dream about. What every reader of this review should know—and why every reader should see this movie—is that Another Country is the first commercial film ever to present an outspoken and heartfelt plea for gay liberation. No other film of its genre has so realistically depicted the tensions, the hypocrisies, the torments, and most assuredly, the passions of a gay man's attempts to be himself among others.

Basing his script on the real-life story of Guy Burgess, an English aristocrat who defected to the Soviet Union in the 1950's, Julian Mitchell has performed the miraculous: He's managed to take a political thesis and turn it into a thrillingly dramatic and involving movie. More than anything you can buy at Modern Times Bookstore, Mitchell's screenplay explains just how and why an openly homosexual male is as threatening to the Establishment as any openly Communist man.

The plot centers around two schoolmates, Guy Bennett and Tommy Judd. Bennett is intelligent, clever, iconoclastic, and gay. Judd is intelligent, clever, iconoclastic, and Communist. Since their proclivities have performed made them outcasts, they can't help but become friends. At first, Bennett is more accepted by his peers than Judd because he has "had" so many of them; homosexual activity seems accepted by these lads as a phase through which most of them will pass. The threat it poses is minimal, because they assume all who indulge this term will deny it the next.

As with any other organization based on capitalistic (or, I daresay, communist) philosophies, the prep school of Another Country is riddled with nonsensical rules and prescribed behaviors. Idealists both, Bennett and Judd see through these absurd artifices and yearn for freedom—Bennett for a time when he can openly profess his sexuality, Judd for a communist future that will bring justice for all.

Both characters are fascinating, but it is Bennett who becomes the focus of the film when he commits the disturbing sin of acknowledging his homosexuality as real and unchangeable. The open ardor he displays toward a younger classmate becomes more threatening than all of Judd's Leninist rantings, because it touches the heart rather than the head. And, as enunciated by many of the boys throughout the film, the most important thing is to "overcome personal feelings."

The question of how a militant homosexual managed to get along in Stalinist Russia is not explored. In the few brief scenes that frame the story, we see Bennett today in his modern Moscow apartment, a caput invalid in a wheelchair, cared for by a silent, attractive young man—his nurse? lover? guard? Bennett claims to miss nothing about England except cricket, but his demeanor gives him away: The system has won in the end; for the roughish, passionate boy has dissolved into this cerebral shell of lost hopes and broken dreams.

The craft that went into making this film is superb. Peter Bizou's photography turns the school grounds into a lush idyllic fantasy kingdom that's every schoolboy's dream. Brian Morris has used a disparate group of buildings to create a believable school, subtly emphasizing architectural details that point up its prison nature. And director Marek Kaniwska has elicited extraordinary performances from the entire ensemble.

Adrian Ross-Magenty plays a freshman "prole" with as much insight as Anna Massey brings to her cameo role as Bennett's silly but caring mother. Tristan Oliver is appropriately hateful as the devilish incipient Nazi, and Rupert Wainwright is perfectly bland as a boringly decent compromiser.

But it is the performances of the three main characters that raise the film to its highest level. Cary Elwes may or may not prove to be a good actor in all his future films, but here he provides all that is necessary as the object of Bennett's love. His glowing presence dares everyone in the audience to fall in love with him. Colin Firth embodies the classic young rebel intellectual, full of grand ideas and grander hot air. But in the end it is Rupert Everett's film. Outrageously sly, casually masculine, achingly feminine, powerfully human, Everett can't help but become the real Star '80. When he talks of licking honey off his beloved's chin, when he sings a mournful Gershwin tune on the floor of the library, Everett bests all other actors in memory at providing such a convincing (and comfortable) portrayal of love—and lust. Ask what other actor could utter the line "Do you like smoked salmon?" and communicate such volumes about passion and romance?

And, in the end, that is what Another Country is: a grand romance in the grandest Hollywood traditions. That Mitchell had to adapt the framework of another time, another place in which to clothe his simple story is a testament to the fact that things really haven't changed all that much in the fifty intervening years.

Except that today we can see Another Country and tell our friends what its makers seem too scared to tell their audiences.

Ari Ake Sushi

My date, Jim, picked me up, and we dashed off to pick up a check so we could have dinner together. We had stopped at the Pilsner for a drink, and I mentioned that I had heard of a good place for sushi nearby. The line there made us change our minds, and Jim suggested a small place on Noe.

Ari Ake Sushi is situated in an old Victorian storefront that shows only a couple of Japanese lanterns in the transom to give a clue to what is inside. Here one finds a clean, neat room that has the traditional light colored wood, a few items of Japanese handcraft, grass matting framed along the wall, and rice paper lighting fixtures. The customers are mostly neighborhood types like leather men, professional women, and a sprinkling of young family groups. E.J. Nozaki and her husband, Yoshi Nozaki, and partner Taki Togami opened Ari Ake Sushi about fifteen months ago. E.J. said they hoped to keep the place small, quiet and uncrowded.

I was immediately taken by the very attractive menu and its stunning graphics. What was more important were the contents. The menu is totally sushi and sashimi. It is offered either in combinations or a la carte. With the combinations you get both soup and appetizer. The appetizer special this night was a very nice pickled daikon seasoned with toasted sesame seed, ginger and soy.

The miso soup at Ari Ake is rich and flavorful. So often this is sort of an afterthought and tasteless. Not here.

We ordered the sushi and sashimi combination for two at $19.90. This arrived in two stages on footed pine planks. The shredded carrot and radish brightened up the plate and the sliced pickled ginger and wasabi (green horseradish) added additional color to the very attractive presentation. This is a terrific bargain, as it includes 8 pieces of sashimi, 14 pieces of nigiri, and two hosomaki rolls.

Sake is inexpensive here and served in very attractive ceramic containers. Asahi beer is also available in both the small and large sized bottles.

Toshi, who served our table, was quiet and efficient and rather shy. E.J. supervises the dining room and keeps things moving. Yoshi and Taki and a helper run a very efficient kitchen.

I was very pleased with the tea which was served after our meal. It is Genmai Cha, a Japanese green tea flavored with roasted unhulled rice which gives it a very nice nutty flavor.

Ari Ake is open Monday through Saturday from five to ten p.m. Take-out and delivery are both available and they also do catering. By the time you read this, I understand they will be serving lunch (from 11:30 to 2 p.m.) Unlike many Sushi restaurants, Ari Ake will take reservations if you call 621-0290.

Please don't tell anyone about this charming bargain. The owners don't want to work too much harder, and I certainly want to be able to get in when I go back.

Pablo's Spanish Seafood Restaurant

Pablo's is located on 24th Street between Castro and Diamond. This is a charming place with white walls, a latticed ceiling, and large murals of costumed dancers. These dancers are left over from the days Pablo's was a Mexican restaurant. It is appropriate that Pablo's is now Spanish, as the owner, Pablo Vasquez, was born in the Northwest part of Spain and has never lived in Mexico.

Jim, who has survived other reviews with me, and I arrived early this evening to sample the menu of Chef Miguel Vallejo. Miguel was lured to San Francisco after months of telephoning him in his native Spain.

We both ordered an appetizer to exchange. Jim got the fried squid (Calamare Dore) and I ordered prawns in garlic butter (Gambas al Ajillo). I enjoyed the gambas, but felt $7 a bit much for six medium sized shrimp. They were well seasoned with garlic and I enjoyed each bite. Jim's Calamare were a better buy, as the plate was piled high with golden rings of batter fried squid. The batter was very light and the oil obviously fresh.

We also tried a cup of gazpacho ($4.50) which comes with chopped onion and chopped bell peppers. Most of the gazpacho which I have had before had been thicker than this one; however, the seasoning here is very good, and I found it very refreshing on such a warm day.

One appetizer that I recommend very highly is the Chorizo Saleado a la Gallega. This highly spiced sausage is served in equally spicy tomato and garlic sauce. This chorizo comes from a supplier in Los Angeles who Pablo feels comes closest to the authentic flavor of this Spanish specialty.

We decided to share one of the two paellas on the menu here. We selected Paella Marinera ($24 for two) as it has no chicken and only a wide variety of seafood. It was beautifully presented in the traditional iron paella pan and contained red snapper, squid, clams, prawns, crab and the traditional peas and saffroned rice. Three or even four people could have dined on what we were served. We took enough home for lunch the next day.

The bread here comes from an Italian bakery on 24th Street which bakes every day, so it is always fresh.

Pez Espada Costa Del Sol is a large serving of swordfish sauteed in red sauce with bell peppers, onions, tomato, bay leaf and parsley. For non-fish eaters, there are chicken items, and two steaks are available. Entree prices start at $8.50 and top out at $24 on the paella for two or more.

One of the highlights of our meal was the dessert. Pablo suggested the Budin de Pan, which was one of the best bread puddings that I have ever tasted. It was full of plump raisins, cinnamon and covered with a delicious sauce. Despite the large servings at Pablo's, try to save room for it.

The wine list is unusual in that it offers Spanish wines as well as Mexican wines. The Spanish Prilegio de Rey Sancho Rioja is a dry white wine and a very good value at $8.50. By the time you read this, a new house wine will be available by the glass, half or full carafe. Pablo has selected Rancho Yerba Buena as the house wine. There are also selections from California, France and the previously mentioned Pedro Domecq Spanish and Mexican wines.

We tried a bottle of Los Reyes, a Pedro Domecq Mexican wine, and this was a delightful and surprising dry white wine. The Mexican wine industry has come a long way since I lived in Mexico and ordered them regularly.

Pablo himself will seat you and supervise your order and service. He is handsome and charming without being obsequious.

Typical of 24th Street, the clientele here is mixed. Gay men, straight couples, and lesbians all having food in a very friendly atmosphere. The kitchen is small, but very efficient and extremely clean. Chef Miguel works very hard to assure that you will eat well. We did.

Halfway through 1984, and Big Brother (or is it sister?) is still watching us. There is a line of clothes with exactly that logo, via Lee Rodgers. This is for the first time—anywhere. It is "Dearborn and Rodgers" enterprises at 191 Frederick St. Suite #24, SF, CA 94117. This line of clothing may possibly become a collectable item for 1984. You may get a wholesale price list upon request, by either writing or calling (415) 753-0640—24 hr. hotline. They have T-shirts; shirts; rumpus shirts; etc.—all in good, long lasting material. Go-For-It! Tell 'em you read it here.

The Pendulum sure treated the Tavern Guild (yes, I'm still secretary) like gold the other Tuesday, cheers to you Mike and Rod; you too, Wally. Happy birthday to you Mr. Mouse, and to you, too, Dwight. Yep, Lucy is still there, while Lucy is, still, too at the

The Jock-Strap Dance/Sex Contest was filmed on July 15th for showing on Cable Channel 6 on Wed and Fri nights at 10 pm, or on Castro St., right in front of Crown Books—and they're right. It couldn't be more graphic!! Besides Jerry Semas, Diamond John, Lady Rona, and myself—you'll see the mistress Kathy Allan White (B.A.R.) Dick Johnson (where was Wayne Friday?) Jim Cvitanich (Men Behind Bars), and Sister Sadie, and if you saw the show you know the crowd was on a good high. Come down and join us every other Sunday at 10th and Harrison. Jerry also informs me that the Cleo Awards are on their way; tickets are on sale as of August 1st. Also there's an Elton John concert coming at the end of the month (a great entertainer). Then there's the tea that "Advocate Men" will be out in Sept. featuring Joe Tolbe (A Hot Man). In October at Castro and 18th there will be a new singing telegram business—watch 4 it—and on August 9th, there will be a V.I.P. party at the End-Up! You customers being the V.I.P.'s. $3.00 cover will take care of your food, drink, and fun. And watch soon for Johnson and Johnson Presents (right after Labor Day), a video tape of the Gay Freedom Day Parade, with all donations going to the Godfather Fund. You'll hear about it. Hi Cobalt... With the Gay March, and the Democratic Convention, and the Parade behind us, we can now take a deep breath and sigh of relief—and feel right proud of ourselves. Maybe even some of our sex lives can go back to normal. Remember that song "Where Have All the Flowers Gone"? Well some of us are singing "Where Have All The Glory Holes Gone!"

Onward... A bumper to report is one of the original good guys, Mark Murdock, from the New Bell's family of customers, is in the hospital. His spirits are high, and if I know Mark, he'll hopefully be out and about in no time. Send him a card c/o the New Bell Saloon at 1203 Polk St., SF CA 94109, and they'll make sure he gets the cards. A little prayer wouldn't hurt either. Get well, our man of the potato chips... Mark Friese and his "Bar Wars", along with Paul Seidler, did A-OK! And, it's still going on... So far $1,037 for the Godfather Fund. You can also add $590 more from David Kelsey and his piano playing, and good for them.

Whilst in the East Bay, Ed Paulson, Little Mother, and the Gay Sheriff, Shawn, are doing their thing for AIDS—Eddie and Lil' Mom so far towards their 20 grand goal have $11,753. Incredible!... The Tavern Guild's Picnic is coming on Sept. 16th. It's our 20th annual picnic, and the price is 12 bucks, with free food, drink, and a great raffle for fine prizes (Trip to Fla., Scooter, Cash, etc...) Tickets for all the above at your favorite T.G. Bar. Think Doom Flume! The Tavern Guild just may get their building soon, and they have a really nice insurance program in the works, too. All the more reason to join. Right Mae? (Now at the Blue and Gold.) Have ya' noticed how well Don Rodgers from Gingers is looking lately? Big Bird too! What's Happening?

Meanwhile, back to the T.G. Nes-Paz finally got his money—right, Bonko? And the new officers are the incumbents. The next meeting is at 1 pm on Aug 14th at the Polk Gulch Saloon. See ya' there, I hope! The Gay Community Thrift Store is doing real good, thanx in part to Don Meisen. Take a look-see and browse at 625 Valencia. If you have items for the store, call 861-4910 for pick-ups. The items donated are sold to the charity of your choice. That's right—You choose it. Take advantage of doing something nice to those less fortunate—You'll be a better person. I gave 5 TV's to the SPCA.

Meanwhile, the Q.T. (really the Q.T. II) at 1312 Polk St. is doing its thing. Different entertainment 7 nights a week, no cover, and a great crowd and crew, consisting of Warren, Dan, Tony, Ellis, Mitch, Vern, and Derek—Marty?—No, not here, he's now bartending, daze, at the In-B-Tween, in Hayward. (That's probably where you'll find Allen White.) I'm now working there, and so far, so good. See ya' there—C'mon down... To John Hauser, and Jim Houghton—Thanx, Hey, Lips—I used you as a reference.

Here's wishing Dick (Cristal) a happy birthday and many, many more to you! To you too, Randy Humphries... and you too—Tony (Q.T.). Hi, Reba! Now at the Mother Lode on Post and Larkin—R and R... Yep, they're now at 1145 Folsom, and good luck to Bob Merl, Bryan Todd, and cast and crew. You can see Francesca upstairs at the hotel!

There seems to be a little shake-up in the SF Pool League—seems a lot of teams are not re-joining. A lot of reasons, but the main one seems to be too many "straights" playing, which leads me to the C.S.L., from where the G.S.L. was born, due to the same reason: "straights". We just can't seem to get along! Wonder why? C.S.L. is alive and well anyway, with the fine team—The Bunkhouse—doing a bang-up job. Peter Storch gets a lot of deserving credit because of their winning streak, as do, of course, the players—both gay and straight, all getting along, which in itself says a lot. You see, we can get along, if we want to. What say you?

Chuck at the New Bell is now at Google's—I hope! Ga-Roovy couple of the week (or the weak, sleek—and not the meek) are Tony and Irene of the New Bell La Belle—two right-on people—hi, kids... Janies Boys, the bowling team I bowl on every Sunday at 6 pm (Reno League) at Japan Bowl, is named after the roller skating great Joan Weston. The team consists of Larry (Super-Duck) Ellis, Rick, Dale, and of course myself. It's a gas, and we have a good time too. And if you think the Jolter team member can skate—The Wonderful Whirl Gray—you should see him bowl. Off the track he's one of the good guys.

Another good guy is Don (Huggy) Penniman (Welcome home Jimmy) from Febe's, of course... John Chase is back with 'Lil Abner, soon to live; but you can see the film at the Castro Theater at midnight, Aug. 25th with the Four Skins, and maybe even a Prom Queen or King... that despite the immediate problem, which is a grave one, gay lovemaking, gay sex and gay feelings will always be with us. So, I've tried to make a film that makes people feel good about their bodies and about libidinous feelings.

Does Daddy Dearest present the older man/younger man dichotomy?

No. Believe it or not, I've made a film that doesn't have an older man or a younger man as the basic theme. This is a film about a porno filmmaker, in New York, making a pornographic film. You know, a light little mindless romp that most pornography is. And we see that film being made, and we see the scenes that he's producing in the full panoply of their heat. But at the same moment, running through his mind, as an artist, a commercial artist, a pornographer, are several other themes: One, an ex-lover that he keeps flashing on, in his mind, since they've broken up, and also, two young men across a courtyard, who are lovers currently, and who hold out a certain attraction to this filmmaker, since he's single at the moment. Then, finally, the filmmaker's own interest in one of the members of his cast, which often happens in pornography.

How did you get the title, Daddy Dearest?

The film, that the filmmaker is making, has a forbidden title, and as it is about to be completed, his producer says we cannot call it this forbidden title, the newspapers will not give us any ad space, so you better come up with another title. The title he comes up with is Daddy Dearest. It is not a spinoff from Mommy Dearest, it's not about a gay Joan Crawford, or is that a tautology, I'm not sure. It's an internal title from the film.

The title in the film is the kind where the Chronicle prints "Call the theatre for details?"

Exactly. Yes. But it works in the film. Also, Daddy Dearest is the title because usually, when I say it to people, they immediately laugh. And I chose that title so that their defenses might drop a bit, then they might start to relax and enjoy the picture. This is a picture that attempts, directly, to move the audience, not only comedically but also erotically: One of the ways to do that is to get people to slow down a bit, and drop their usual set of defenses, whether their words or rhetoric or cial. Also, believe it or not, the porno films have provided the strangest and oddest spinoffs into the funding of political documentaries. I remember a wonderful backer, a woman from Marin, who saw my film Passing Strangers. She was so pleased with it, that it had some tenderness in it, that she put up the first money that helped Gay USA be made back in 1977.

At a dinner party, when asked what do you do? I say, "I'm a pornographer." People then drop their spoons in the fruit cocktail and they look over at the host, as if to say, "Who invited him?" meaning me.

Do you plan to continue this dual career, as both a serious filmmaker and a producer of male pornos?

For me, it's a mixture of necessity, both financial and artistic, and also choice. It's really hard to get funding to make gay pictures, gay story films in America. I don't know how it is for Wim Wenders in Germany or Rosa von Praunhein, who's funded by the West Berlin government, but if you're just a gay filmmaker, who has a talent for narrative, and you want to tell a story about Bruce and Phillip and their relationship, it's very difficult to raise the money to shoot it because even a sixteen millimeter talking feature costs a lot. So, the gay X area has always provided me with a chance to quickly make a film on a subject, or make a film that shows aspects of gay life, that normally I would have to have a three-year fundraising blitz to raise money to do. There is some money to be made in gay pornography for the filmmaker, but not as much as all my friends imagine. And, of course, when they come up to my house and have to put up with my spartan-like cooking, they realize that it's true. So it's a necessity, both artistic and finan-

Is there a big difference between the way straight pornography, as on the Playboy cable channel, is shot and the way most gay pornographers have to work?

Straight pornography is just a completely different ball game. We're talking about budgets that range between five hundred thousand to a million and a half dollars to shoot a sex picture for straight people. They're shot in thirty-five millimeter, and they have a huge distribution. It really parallels the fact that straight life is out of the closet and, still, much of gay life is in the closet. So, the gay pie in the X field is very small, despite the burgeoning video market. So filmmakers get miniscule budgets to make films on, and that's one of the reasons why so much of gay pornography is boring.

Some feminists believe that all pornography, including the gay male division, oppresses women. Do you agree, and what is your feeling about the confrontational tactics employed by some anti-porn feminists?

All people, women in particular, have every right to peacefully boycott and educate people out of wanting to go see pornography. I'm against people setting themselves on fire in bookshops. I'm against them planting bombs in porno bookshops. Even if one were to take their line completely and swallow it whole that all pornography is direct violence against women, I don't think treating violence with violence is a particularly apt or efficient way of dealing with it. Gay pornography, it seems to me, has very little to do with women. I may be one of the few gay pornographers, along with Fred Halsted, who's even put women in the films. Forbidden Letters has a nature part that's non-sexual for a woman. I think much of the gay world, and gay pornography in particular, is not interested in women. That, in itself, may peeve and irk women, but I don't see the gay pornographic world attacking women, even indirectly. I'm not even using the normal arguments, which is who is to determine what is obscene, pornographic, violent and aggressive. I've seen many, many straight films that are boring, pretty heavy against women, where women are abused and tied up and all. I think it's part of a culture that views women that way. The only answer to it is for other films to be made and for a more positive part of the culture to answer the negative part of the culture in its own terms. I don't think that throwing ink wells, or bombs or fists, at the screen is the way to do it.

What are you working on now? Is there still another Artie Bressan film persona we haven't glimpsed yet?

Yes! I've just finished a comedy, which I've sent to an agent in California. It's not a gay picture, but just a regular mainstream comedy. It is about the porno industry, a burlesque of the X-industry. I'm putting most of my energy into films that can be made and that will play, and that means probably another gay porn and this comedy, which seems to be where producing money lies.

Does the comedy have a working title?

It's called Inside Norma Gariand. It combines Norma Desmond and Judy Garland.

Daddy Dearest plays August 15th at the Century Theatre.

two decades with a nostalgic appeal to an earlier America. Reciting a lengthy litany of questions that might evoke a barefoot boyhood in a country town, Falwell asked his audience, "Do you remember... when you never dreamed your country could lose?... when a boy was a boy and dressed like one?... when songs had a tune and made sense?... when everybody knew the difference between right and wrong?... when you shivered with awe at the sight of a policeman?... when you didn't have to lock your door at night?" The conventioners responded with appreciative laughter or solemn nods at the perceived disappearance of a more wholesome way of life.

He urged his audience to redouble their efforts for family and patriotic values. "America hasn't come back yet," he intoned, "as long as homosexuality is an acceptable lifestyle... as long as Nicaragua is gone and Central America is in danger." The audience gave him a standing ovation as his aides whisked him out a side door through a hotel kitchen.

Schlafly spoke on the subject of equal pay for equal work for men and women, calling it "equal pay for unequal work." The whole issue of equal pay, she claimed, "comes deceptively packaged as an equal rights issue" but in reality means government controls to dictate a wage system. Such matters, she said, are better left to the dictates of the free market economy.

Schlafly disputed the meaning of the oft-cited statistics showing that the average working woman earns 59% compared to the average man's $1.00. The fact that women spend fewer years in the workforce and often interrupt their careers to care for children partly accounts for this discrepancy, according to her, since it makes promotion to higher-paying jobs less frequent for women. In addition, Schlafly said, she "saw a streak of envy" in advocating that female clerical workers should be paid as much as blue collar men who work outdoors in physically uncomfortable or risky jobs.

The convention's second session was entirely devoted to homosexuality, featuring a consideration of the gay rights movement, laws against homosexuality, and therapy for homosexuals, intended to encourage celibacy or heterosexuality.

Father Enrique Rueda, a Roman Catholic priest and Cuban emigre who is the author of The Homosexual Network, a massive study of the "homosexual movement," expounded a view based on so-called "natural law," a doctrine upheld by Catholic theologians for centuries.

Speaking with calm assurance, Rueda called homosexuality "contrary to the very nature of human sexuality." Since "reproduction is the clear responsibility of the human race" and society should encourage the family, "homosexual behavior is deleterious to the individual and to society." Rueda told his audience that an openly gay teacher or a school curriculum that presents homosexuality as acceptable would be objectionable: "A homosexual is simply not an appropriate role model." In an interview after his speech, Rueda said that even public demonstrations of affection among gays—such as hand-holding—are objectionable. However, Rueda said that he "would not advocate a witch hunt" and in most cases would not argue for the passage of laws against homosexuality, since informal social pressure was more effective in any case. He thought current sodomy laws should be left on the books, however, because they "enshrine the collective judgement of society."

Rueda also argued against granting homosexuals "special rights" accorded by gay rights legislation. Such laws, he said, would "place heterosexuality and homosexuality on equal footing." He declared, "There is no evidence that homosexuals are victims of discrimination."

The other two speakers outlined what they claimed were the cause and cure of homosexuality—at least of male homosexuality. Dr. Don Tweedie, a psychologist who has taught at Christian colleges and is now in private practice in Southern California, maintained that deficient family environment is the most probable cause of homosexuality, and claimed that it is possible in many cases to change a homosexual inclination to a heterosexual one. Dr. Tweedie's presentation was relatively objective and—for this conference—non-controversial, except for his description of the various methods of therapy he had practiced. The list included the use of what he called "zappers" in aversion therapy. This method is a kind of negative conditioning in which the patient is encouraged to entertain homosexual fantasies or look at homoerotic pictures and is then given an electric shock. However, in an interview after his speech, Tweedie said that he had used this method only experimentally and had given it up, considering it "fundamentally assaultive" and undercutting the relationship between therapist and patient.

The third speaker, Frank Worthen, heads Love in Action, an organization based in Marin that provides a kind of sanctuary for homosexuals who have accepted Christianity and are trying to convert to celibate or heterosexual lifestyles. Worthen introduced the unexpected into what had been a thoroughly predictable recital of religious doctrine. He gave personal "testimony" as a gay man who had given up a gay lifestyle of many years to follow Christ. He spoke of "the emptiness and shallowness of homosexual relationships." He also said that organizations like his own that minister to repentant homosexuals, belong in the churches, which often shun gays even after religious conversion. "Homophobia is a real factor," he said.

Other speakers at the convention addressed issues in education, business, politics, and specific social issues like abortion and welfare. Most affirmed the spiritual and even the economic benefits of "traditional Judeo-Christian values" and of what U.S. Representative Newt Gingrich called "the conservative opportunity society."

The well-dressed conventioners ranged in age from those in their early twenties to the elderly. The vast majority, with only a few exceptions, were white. Almost all seemed to be true believers in conservative religion and politics, although there were several members of groups opposed to the Moral Majority who paid the $60 fee to attend Family Forum III.

From the first invocation of the convention to Paul Weyrich's concluding "God love you," traditional religion seemed to unite speakers and conventioners. Even speakers in professions usually considered thoroughly secular produced statements like "God is a Family God," and state assemblymen spoke feebly of the power of prayer. Both days of the convention began with prayer, and references to the Bible peppered conversations among conventioners. In the atmosphere of Family Forum III, it seemed quite normal to find three young men in their mid-twenties earnestly discussing the nature of repentance, or two middle-aged housewives comparing passages from the Book of Leviticus.

Family Forum III was a full-scale media event, with dozens of newspapers and TV reporters, cameramen, and glaring lights. The Holiday Inn provided a small press room that could barely contain the throng of reporters at Jerry Falwell's Thursday press conference, and his Friday press conference moved to the much larger Cotillion Room of the hotel.

In responding to reporters' questions, Falwell, always smiling and often seeming barely to suppress a chuckle, denounced pornography as "a cancer in our society, abortion as murder, and 'the gay lifestyle' as a 'moral perversion...reprobate, abominable, unseemly, wrong.'" While he said he had no wish to deny anyone their civil rights, he opposed granting "special privileges" that would legitimize the gay lifestyle—an allusion to gay rights bills. He said that he had no objection to "a practicing homosexual teaching as long as he does not present his lifestyle as acceptable or recruit."

Reporters' favorite questions focused on Mondale's selection of Geraldine Ferraro as a running mate, and on gay and women's issues. In interviews with the press, Phyllis Schlafly called Ferraro a spokesperson for "the radical feminist agenda," which, she said, involved the drafting of women, a women's right "to kill her unborn baby," and lesbian rights. Schlafly said that the American public would reject Ferraro and the Democratic ticket on these grounds. "I'm glad [Mondale] picked her," Schlafly said.

For years The Angels of Light charged no admission and usually included a free feast after the show. Holy Cow marked a turning point for the company; they sold tickets for the first time—"also this show put us in the public eye. Chronicle critic Bernie Weiner came and reviewed our show, and we went on to receive four Bay Area Critics Circle Awards, including Best Musical."

The Angels' latest show, Cinderella Two, marks the third collaboration for the team of Curzon and Turner. It will also be the first of their musicals to be staged so far, although Daniel Curzon notes that it will win that distinction by a whisker. "Actually, our first show, Comeback, about a male singer making a comeback as a female, is being produced in Chicago this fall. We wrote that show in 1978 and have revised it umpteen times since. We did it long before Tootsie and Victor Victoria. Our other musical, No Mince Pies, is about the rise of the Puritans during the rule of Oliver Cromwell in England. It's a low-key political musical, showing the similarities between the Puritans then and the fundamentalists now. But it's not a satire. I also wanted to show how we've become the arms merchants of the world, selling heaps and heaps of weapons for murdering people—and then wondering why there's so much killing in the world! But even this show is first and foremost an entertainment. The parallels between the past and the present are not forced on the audience."

Dan Turner explains that there is no explicit gay theme in Cinderella Two, although that theme runs through past work of Turner, Curzon and the Angels. "Personalities and sexual identities do get confused in Cinderella Two. The characters expand their self-awareness by seeing others as themselves."

Partner Daniel Curzon adds, "There may be a gay 'sensitivity' at work here, but I think that just means talent. It's a show that gays will love, but it's meant to have the widest possible appeal. It's for everybody!"

It's a practice in the theatre now to test market the product before preview audiences just to see how some numbers play before a live crowd. Curzon declares that Cinderella Two passed its preview party, at the home of Gay Games head Tom Waddell, with flying colors. "We did six of the numbers from the show for the 180 people present and created a great deal of enthusiasm. I think we're onto a big hit. For example, the ballad How Far Can Love Reach? got prolonged applause from the preview party."

Dan Turner notes that he and Curzon have developed their own special methods of crafting their musicals together. "Daniel writes the book. I compose the music, and we collaborate primarily on the lyrics to the songs. He usually begins with a simple outline of lyrics with which I fiddle, trying to find the hook to the song. Sometimes I'm reminded of a tune I have already written and I'm tempted to raid my trunk of treasures. Then comes the process of fitting the idea in words to the melody. I play my version for Curzon on the piano using both his lyrics and my own. Daniel then takes these home with a tape of the tune. (I imagine him singing to the tape with gusto as he tries out various combinations.) Together, again, we start fine-tuning the lyrics with the melody on the piano. We try and think of fresh images and rhymes to say what we want to say. We share many laughs over incongruous possibilities before we're satisfied."

Daniel Curzon declares proudly that Cinderella Two is bucking the trend in the '80s for nostalgia musicals. "I'd love to reverse that trend. It's virtually impossible to mount a new musical these days. Even here in San Francisco we've had to do it on a shoestring budget of ten thousand dollars. People have exhausted the nostalgia craze. We've got to have some musicals of our own time, that speak to our own needs. The whole system of high rents at theatres, excessive pay for actors—all this must be examined and fixed. There are people like Dan Turner and I out there writing new musicals, and we will be heard, if it kills us!"

Advanced reservations for tickets to Cinderella Two are available by writing the show care of 511 Capp Street, or by calling (415) 648-3653.

opted by the establishment we wanted to change, they say, and we've been asleep for too long. If we don't wake up now, we'll have to bear the responsibility for our apathy.

It's a debatable thesis, but whether I agree with the company on their politics certainly doesn't affect my admiration for their skill. Street theatre must be one of the most difficult performance genres to perfect; there's certainly no company around that has mastered it quite as stylishly as our own Mime Troupe. Whether cajoling the crowd to quiet down, dancing or soulfully singing up a storm, or broadly emoting subtle caricatures, the company provides entertainment at its most accessible, without pandering to the lowest common denominator.

This time around they've taken inspiration from Charles Dickens in fashioning a moralistic fable about one Ebenezer Jones, an up-and-coming black lawyer. He used to lead student radicals to armed revolt at his Ivy League school. But when the time came to be co-opted, he jumped at the rewards. Now it's almost Election Day, 1984, and Mr. Jones is visited by the spirits of his past, present, and future. His confrontation with his self-made nightmare forms the plot, and the Mime Troupe leads us to their desired conclusion.

And yet, and yet...Why was the strongest emotion I felt that of nostalgia for the good 'ol days of protest and agitation? Why did Nixon look so good? Why did so many people leave Dolores Park chatting about the Joan Rivers imitation? And why did the actors ignore the lone female voice crying from the audience, "Voting won't change anything?"

As I folded up my blanket, a man near me said, "They really didn't give you any good reason to vote after all." The Mime Troupe is known for its desire to improve and fine-tune their material; maybe by the time their last performance rolls around, they'll have come up with something to persuade that man—and me—that in 1984 the most radical action ex-radicals can take is to mark a ballot.

she does it full justice by holding the mother's volatile emotions at the simmering point.

Camille Howard's interpretation of Son's lawyer was impersonal and efficient. I would have thought that after listening to the boy's tale for two hours she might have revealed more warmth and compassion. Teddy Love as Old Fool acted most expressively with his body, and Jill Romero and Velinda Brown, as Sisters 1 and 2, were fine in what were basically "walk on" parts.

Theresa Baomi Butts-Bhanji served as magistrate, as a witness, and as a member of the chorus. In too-brief choral solos, her voice shines in beauty.

A major dramatic device is the use of a 17-member chorus whose a capella rhythms draw on religious, secular, calypso and blues themes to comment on the action. While there are no set-piece songs, the chorus sings throughout, with members moving forward to assume character roles in dramatic scenes. Especially effective were Esther Scott (wonderfully funny and real as the gossipy neighbor), Jacqui Marshall (as a social worker and as the wife of lover 2), Sterling Cotton (as lover 4), Shabaka (as lover 1), Joe Carter (Bossman), Yvonne Lorvan (Bossman's wife) and Madeline Abel (a teacher).

Produced by Heritage (a non-profit organization for the preservation of Bahamian culture), Junkanoo Magazine, and the Eureka Theatre, You Can Lead a Horse to Water was co-directed by Philip Burrows and Richard Seyd. Cleophas Addeley composed the original music and rhythms. Sets were by Alan Curren, costumes (unassumingly realistic) were by Susan Anderson, and the lighting design was by Kurt Landisman. Billed as a "Bahamian national epic," it continues through September 2 at the Julian Theatre, 953 DeHaro St., San Francisco. Performances are Wednesday through Saturday at 8 pm, Sundays at 7 pm. Box office: 647-8098.

An adventurous, courageous, risk-taking-in-interpersonal-dynamics, honest, intimate, attentive, present, nurturing, emotionally and intellectually expressive, self-loving womanist? Please Don't Pass Me By

In this world of instant gratification and limited attention spans, it is ever more difficult to make and keep a friend. Regardless of this I am eager to attempt new friendships with women who are patient, understanding and perceptive, who have strong presence of heart and mind, and a genuine ability to listen. I strongly believe that being sexual requires some thoughtfulness beyond initial attraction and that emotional intimacy and affection don't have to happen only in sexual relationships. I am an attractive black woman who is approaching 30, quiet, warm hearted, romantic, reasonable, curious and studious. I am serious, yet have the ability to laugh and play with complete abandon. Even in these difficult times, perhaps we can take the time to know one another. Reply CUI Box AT3

I would like to meet a cute, fraternity-like guy, 18-30 years old who has a zest for life and likes himself, and has lots of self-esteem. He must not be a wimp, but must be caring and sensitive and desiring an interesting lover. He must be willing to explore the wonderful possibility of a meaningful long-term relationship with someone who gives of himself 100% to that one special person. I am a well-educated, handsome, sexual young man who is confined to a wheelchair, but am not disabled emotionally or physically. Try me! This may change your whole life. GWM Over 60 Loves To Write And Receive Letters and is now down to only four correspondents: two cousins and two classmates who go back to grammar school days. Would like to contact letter-writers of either sex or sexual orientation. Mainly interested in letters but if such could lead to personal contacts and friendships that would be right to discuss. Can discuss most matters of general interest except sports and computers. Have a BA from Nebraska and have attended SFSU the last 7 semesters just for fun; not an intellectual snob by any means—a bookworm since age 5, read anything that is interesting even trash if it holds my interest. Once hoped to write but don't have the compulsion to write that is really essential to that calling. Like some movies but prefer the theatre. There are so many excellent little theatre groups in the area. They all do good work and I attend many of them. I had done volunteer work for the past 14 years—reading aloud to the blind until I began to feel "used up" on it but I stayed with it till my last client died last January at the age of 95—she was almost totally blind but was very keen minded and had miraculously acute hearing. It was very rewarding in a non-material way and I got more than I gave. For something a little different now I would like to be there for others—looks race, and or religion not important at all—just be there to call and write or discuss things with for a change of interests and opinions. Mainly interested in receiving letters but if future contacts and friendships develop from same, that would be fine too. Reply Boxholder, POB 6184, SF CA 94101.

Looking for special people or special person, because I'm special. I'm cute, in a Jewish sort of way. Tall, trim, bearded and moustached. Not much hair on top, but lots on my body. I like the city too, and all the arts. That includes, I LOVE KINKY SEX! On shore, I love to kiss, and I'm addicted to cuddling. But I also love all kinds of sex—mutual & m, w/s, it work, ball stretching and ass exploration. I love bondage, deep throating and fucking. I love playing both top and bottom, showing off and jacking off. And all through this, I'm safe-sex, health conscious. There aren't many like me around. I'm worth it. Reply CUI Box AT59
