One of the costs of living today is involvement in legal affairs. To most people the 'law' is vague and meaningless less mass of words.

Most of us know what it is to be arrested and tried and involved in criminal law. Few of us know the involvement of civil law.

Many, many people are in need of advice regarding both criminal and civil law and simply cannot afford it. How these offices function and found Attorney Herb Donald.

Now, as a service of the Economic Opportunity Council, counseling in matters of civil law is readily available, at no charge, to everyone.

The San Francisco Neighborhood Legal Assistance Foundation has four offices "in to bring the benefits and protection of the law to those who have long been denied them.

The Foundation is a non-profit corporation, chartered in 1966 under the laws of the State of California.

The principal goal of the Foundation is to bring the benefits of the law to those who have long been denied them. To that end the Foundation is committed to provide clients with high-quality legal representation, and to increase access to these services through the establishment of neighborhood law offices in low-income areas of the city.

A further aim of the Foundation is to promote awareness of legal rights, and to encourage the assertion of these rights among the public. Finally, the Foundation works for changes in the law and its administration that will not only benefit the poor, but help to reform the basic ideals of our legal system."

"Unrealistic criminal laws against such things as gambling, abortion, drinking and homosexuality are major causes of police frustration and assembly-line justice in the Nation's courts," President Johnson's Crime Commission has reported.

Most persons close to the administration of justice have long been aware that the courts and the police have spent many, many hours dealing with purely social problems and have had to let the protection of life, liberty and property become a secondary issue.

The report has strongly urged that laws regarding social matters be stricken from the books.

For instance, many police hours are consumed to capture and punish those who gamble, yet the general public finds no great wrong in placing a bet with a bookie, or playing bridge for high stakes.

The commission has urged that the drunk be treated as a matter for social agencies rather than clogging the courts with hundreds of thousands of drunk charges each year. In San Francisco the complete time of one court is taken up with nothing but drunk charges.

The Commission reported, "basic social interests demand the use of the strongest possible sanctions against rape, child molestation, commercialized vice and to protect the institutions of marriage and family."

However the Commission recognized that, "these interests are not at stake, as in the case of most consensual misbehavior between adults." Such cases would include fornication, adultery, bigamy and homosexuality.

In the cases of relations between adult men and women the Commission said laws against it, "reflect an idealized moral code, not what a substantial percentage of the population, judged by their conduct, regard as beyond the margin of tolerability for the average fallible citizen."

Homosexual conduct, the commission reported, is more and more thought to be a psychological problem and therefore might be better handled by others than criminal law processes.

The Commission called for the abandonment of the common idea that to make something criminal is a sure cure for the public.

This Commission was composed of attorneys, law enforcement officials, judges, etc., from all over the country. Chief of Police Tom Cahill of San Francisco is on the Commission.
